letter from the editor

To you from failing hands we throw the torch. Be yours to hold it high!

This quote is borrowed from that most famous of Canadian poems; "In Flanders Field" by John McCrae, but if you're a Montrealer, or a former one, this phrase has only one prevailing association. It appears emblazoned in the dressing room of the Montreal Canadiens, the most storied franchise in professional hockey, if not all of professional sports. Given the long and venerable history of the Montreal Jewish Community, this excerpt could just as easily find a home in the atrium of Cummings Square, the nerve centre of Jewish Montreal.

To our regular readers, I hope you will enjoy this exposé of who we are, a little self-indulgent perhaps, but I believe you will be filled with nachas at our achievements. While this issue does not deviate too much from our usual offering, please allow me to apologize, in advance, as we reduced our French content in this issue.

To our national readers, these sixteen pages should give you a sense of our communal strength. Some of the best examples of this strength bear repeating; unparalleled Jewish day school enrollment, high synagogue affiliation, low intermarriage, unwavering support of our brethren in Israel and unrivaled per capita commitment to the principles of Tzedakah as evidenced by our annual fundraising Campaign.

These accomplishments don't just happen, however, they are developed, supported and nurtured by a strong and enduring communal infrastructure where one generation is shaped and inspired by the skills, experiences and aptitudes of the previous one.

One of the key programs which has been instrumental in fostering this next generation of leadership is ProMontreal. Since its inception ten years ago, 5,000 graduates have found jobs in our city with the help of Contact ProMontreal, the job placement service. Fourteen businesses have received over $50,000 in start-up capital through the ProMontreal Entrepreneurs initiative. Tens of thousands have attended ProMontreal bashes and countless thousands have been informed and entertained (ok, humour me) through the pages of this magazine.

Why is the reinvestment in this community such a challenging task? Let's face it, Montreal has taken its lumps over the last few decades. Young people have been leaving for seemingly greener pastures and who can blame them. Traditionally, Montreal has not provided adequate opportunities in various industries, and the separatist sword of Damacles has hung over this city for 27 years.

But oh, the times they are a changin'. The sword has been returned to its sheath, at least for the time being. Montreal's economic strengths are evident in the aeronautics, pharmaceutical and telecommunications industries, to name three. Montreal is like a spunky street fighter, it takes its shots but remains standing, ready for its next challenger.

And now, look around at those of us under 40, not the less ambitious who have been left behind, but those who have made the conscious decision to remain. We have done so because we have identified opportunities, we recognize that the standard and cost of living in this city converge in a place unmatched elsewhere, and we believe the importance of living in the same city as parents and grandparents is one of those intangibles that cannot be quantified.

There is a generation of confident, passionate and competent successors to the leadership of this great community, a responsibility not to be taken lightly. A generation which will not only safeguard what has been achieved, but one that is willing and more than able to carry the proverbial torch into the future, to seize the opportunity and to solidify Montreal's rightful place as one of the great Jewish communities of the Diaspora.

I hope you enjoy this little taste of Montreal. Like the first bite of a St-Viateur bagel, I hope it will delight you, but I warn you, it may keep you longing for more.

10 years of success!

by PENNI KOLB, DIRECTOR PROMONTREAL

I can't believe it's been 10 years!!

Seventy-five issues of InMontreal Magazine have been published. 1.8 million copies have been distributed. We have told the story and printed the photos of over 1,000 young people living and thriving in Montreal. We've listed 1,200 jobs for graduates and 2,000 events for young people. We have been cloned in other communities, we've won design and creative awards.

How did it all begin? Why did it begin? ProMontreal was born 10 years ago to create opportunities and encourage young people to build a future in Montreal. The founders knew they had to find a way to communicate with a target market (18-40 year olds) which clearly is not known to read community newspapers in any serious manner.

We had to get a message to them; a message that young people have a future here, that their peers are doing fascinating and productive things in this city and that they can too. We needed to provide the information and resources that would help them begin to build that future. We needed to provide solid role models. We needed to look young, hip, cool, "phat" or whatever word was in vogue 10 years ago. It had to be an easy, interesting read that delivered a message that was positive and strong, but not Pollyanna.

I remember when we were trying to come up with a name for the magazine, someone in the room said that the word he heard most often from his young adult kids was "Out" in response to his most frequent question: "Where you going?" And so, "IN" was born. It took a while to fall off the tongue, but once it did, it stuck.

So many individuals and companies have been part of the "IN" family. From our first Editor-in-Chief, Stanley Plotnick, whose passion, smarts and guts made our first issue possible, to Susan Levine whose understated and intelligent leadership added so much, to Ross Paperman, Helen Levy and David Lisbona, our current Editor-in-Chief, who is one of the most amazing and admirable young men with whom I have ever worked. "IN" has been blessed with the best!

We have been fortunate to attract the greatest writing staff, both paid and volunteer. Lois Liverman and Morrie Baker always find ways to make finding a job or starting a business look feasible and fun. Mitch Joel Cohen's titles and status have changed in the 6 years he has been involved, but his commitment and contributions have not. Special thanks to Derek Cassoff and the many volunteer writers too numerous to mention.

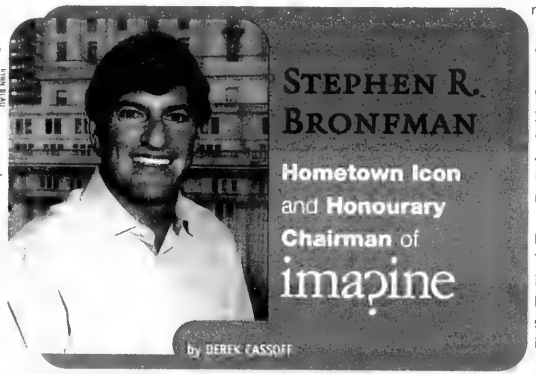
1ST EDITION, MARCH 1993



When you are an heir to one of Canada's largest family fortunes, you can choose to live just about anywhere in the world. Stephen R. Bronfman has done just that – choosing to stay in Montreal, the very city where the Bronfman legacy began.

Snowy winters and a doomed baseball team aside, Bronfman says his connections to Montreal are so strong that he never considered setting up shop anywhere but in his hometown.

"I've had a lot of great experiences in my life and they are all related to Montreal," he says. "It's where I grew up and where my friends are. I've always been happy here."

For many, the Bronfman name is as much a part of the fabric of Montreal as hot bagels and Stanley Cup banners. It was in Montreal that Bronfman's grandfather, Sam, a Russian immigrant, built the foundations of the Seagram's Company. And it was in Montreal that Sam's son, Charles, kept the business growing while using his wealth and influence to help the city's Jewish community flourish.

It is hard to travel through Montreal today without spotting some sign of the Bronfman legacy – the Saidye Bronfman Centre for the Arts, Concordia University's Bronfman House, or the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre, to name just three.

Stephen Bronfman, now 38, is in the midst of assuming his place as a business leader and community philanthropist. After venturing into the entertainment and soymilk arenas, his company, Claridge SRB Investments Inc., recently announced plans to convert an abandoned cinema on Ste. Catherine St. into a multi-million dollar commercial development. The project is expected to breathe new life into the area surrounding the old Montreal Forum – a neighbourhood that has fallen on hard times since the opening of the Bell Centre seven years ago.

"Montreal is doing really well," Bronfman says of the city's economic landscape. "Politically, things have been relatively calm, and foreign investment is pouring into the city. That's always a good sign."

On the community front, Bronfman has become involved in an increasing number of charitable ventures, ranging from the David Suzuki Foundation, which whets his appetite for environmental issues, to FEDERATION CJA's PME Fund, which hands out interest-free loans to young entrepreneurs in Montreal's Jewish community. Last spring, he headed up the Jewish community's Israel Emergency Campaign, which raised $15 million in a matter of weeks.

"Growing up, I remember that my house always felt like a reception hall. There was always some sort of fundraising event taking place," he says. "I'm happy to carry on the family tradition of supporting the Jewish community and institutions in Montreal and Canada."

He believes that his latest contribution, that of lending his name as Honourary Chairman to next April's Imagine, the International Young Leadership Conference and Mystery Ball, presents a wonderful opportunity to show Montreal off to the rest of the world.

"It's important for the world to see all of the great things that are going on here," he says. "People can read in the papers how much we raise for our community, but this is an opportunity for them to come over and get a first-hand look at our community."

by MITCH JOEL

While sucking back some souvlis at a local Greek eatery, a friend of mine (since the day I was born – that would be around 1971 for those still counting) recounted how insane life has become. In the past month, we've both been through a personal washing machine of random of acts of life – it has been pretty nuts. As we delved into the madness of how much life can change in the blink of an eye, there was a moment of silence and then, as he wiped the dripping tzatziki from his chin, mouth and upper right cheek, he just said "we are so lucky to be living in Montreal."

Without getting all Whitney Houston-preachy-like, I think he meant "Canada", but it was nice to hear "Montreal". While I'm not sure anyone feels completely safe after 9/11 and the impending war with Iraq (take two), I do feel completely secure in knowing that it's a fairly sweet ride we have here in Montreal. Looking back, specifically on the French/English issue, I'm kind of hoping both Anglophones and Francophones feel the way I do: I like speaking English and I'm damn happy I have the opportunity to be able to function in French on a daily basis (the Hebrew and Yiddish is also a melodious gravy). I'm also not utterly smashed on Ouzo, and I know Quebec, like any other place in the world, has major issues with government, healthcare, taxes, etc..., but I'll take it – every place has its good points and bad ones. I just have my own Maslow Hierarchy of Needs – and most of the top ones revolve around not being too close to nuclear arms and people who want to kill those who have them. So, yeah, give me a longer wait at the hospital, take nearly half my salary in taxes (which goes to important stuff like reports on the practice of cheaper napkins at $0.99 pizza parlors on Saint Denis Street), because, in the end, Montreal (and Canada) has been quite successful at making its mark. We've managed to stay off the radar...and yet we're givers (we give): just take a look at Celine Dion, Olympic skating scandals, Corey Hart and those "I Am Canadian" Molson ads. Yasou!

Montreal (besides bagels, amazing festivals and all the nightlife a man can muster notwithstanding), is just a great place to be. Beyond the personal sigh of feeling safe in my own city, the community here is truly unique. Places like ProMontreal have afforded me many benefits – those include an amazing place where I fostered my editing skills as the former Editor of this magazine, a place where I met my girlfriend, a place where I've been able to meet others and network, a place to help those in need and, in the end, a place that has interwoven into my life and secured a strong foundation of giving back, helping others and expanding my horizons. As many of you know, I'm an avid reader. Recently, I was thumbing through an old book of business quotations. One discussed "how to get rich" and included this gem: "help others get what they want, and you'll get what you want." Living in Montreal and taking part in the Montreal Jewish Community has made me richer than my wildest dreams (you had me at "hello.")

GROUP MAGSHIMIM MAKING ALIYAH, AUGUST 2003

Up until six months ago, Alexa Singierman was typical of many Canadians in that all she knew about Israel was what she saw on CNN. Although she was raised in a Jewish household and had a traditional Jewish upbringing in Montreal, she did not attend Jewish day school. For her, Israel was a far away land that had experienced nothing but war and conflict since 1948.

Her view changed within the span of 10 days last August, when Singierman had the chance to visit Israel during a birthright israel trip. Seeing the country's spectacular beauty and rich heritage firsthand and meeting with ordinary Israeli citizens opened her eyes to the importance of Israel as a homeland for all Jews and awakened her to the struggles that Israel faces every day.

"The moment we landed in Israel, I was hit by an indescribable feeling. It was like magic," says Singierman, 25. "It made me realize how much we take Israel for granted and how Israelis are making sacrifices for all of us."

When she returned to Montreal, Singierman immediately signed up for Hebrew classes at the local Aliyah centre. She also joined an Israeli Advocacy committee and routinely attends conferences and workshops dealing with the Arab-Israeli conflict.

In doing so, Singierman has joined the ranks of the thousands of Montrealers with passionate feelings for Israel – a group that is eager to revisit the country at any opportunity and is willing to advocate on its behalf back in Canada.

Yair Szlak, director of Montreal's Bronfman Israel Experience Centre, says Singierman's metamorphosis from unaffiliated Jew to passionate Israeli advocate is the quintessential example of how a community with deep-rooted Zionist connections is able to pass along its concerns for Israel from one generation to another.

"There is a continuous bond that binds the Montreal Jewish community to Israel. It's a fantastic environment to work in," says Szlak, who moved to Montreal last summer from Toronto.

Jewish community leaders are divided over what are the driving forces behind Montreal's deep ties to Israel, but most point first and foremost to the city's strong network of Jewish day schools. Nearly three-quarters of all Jewish schoolchildren in Montreal receive some form of formal Jewish education, whether it be at a day school or at afternoon classes.

Many of these students visit Israel for the first time on high school trips, where the stories they read about in Bible class take on a three-dimensional meaning.

Jewish Chamber of Commerce Chambre de commerce juive

Networking par excellence

by JUSTIN VINEBERG

The Jewish Chamber of Commerce of Montreal (the 'JCC') was established in 1997 with the aim of promoting Jewish companies and educating Jewish business people and professionals about business issues as well as promoting economic development within Montreal's business community. It is actually the first Jewish chamber of commerce in North America intended to highlight and enhance the benefits of building a business or a professional career in Montreal. The JCC has grown since its inception and presently has a mailing list of over 1,500 people. Under the leadership of Raquel Kelly Castiel, Evan Feldman and myself, the goals of the JCC have been refined to focus on two key aspects: networking and business education.

JUSTIN VINEBERG, RAQUEL KELLY CASTIEL, EVAN FELDMAN

The JCC's main attraction lies in the valuable networking opportunities it offers. To this end, we hold several types of events: seminars, panel discussions, power breakfasts and cocktail receptions that are designed to cultivate business connections. Our breakfast series have been very popular, offering the chance to learn about a new company or a topic of interest ranging from law and accounting to finance and real estate. Often, we get a tour and an insight into an organization's operations. Our cocktails are a mix of networking and learning – in the past year, we have heard speakers on subjects as diverse as business in Israel and the working of Pfizer Canada. Our 'revolving tables' dinners have grown to provide a particularly effective networking environment. Last year, participants enjoyed a first-rate meal at the Ritz-Carlton Hotel as well as the opportunity to meet nine new people during each course.

Of great significance, the JCC enjoys excellent relationships with other chambers of commerce, including the Young Hellenic Board of Trade, the Canadian Italian Business and Professional Association, the Jeune Chambre de Commerce de Montréal and the Federation of Chinese Canadian Professionals. To further enhance networking possibilities and to forge strong links, we help organize and participate in cocktails with members of these organizations. This year's events will build on our rich history with participants continuing to foster relationships among Jewish business people as well as counterparts in other chambers. Finally, we are launching new initiatives; the "Choices" Business Club will provide certain members to broaden their circle of influence by creating synergies with similar minded people through group discussions and to learn from top business leaders. The Jewish Chamber of Commerce is the networking tool par excellence.

<PROMONTREAL> a cheer for the chairs

Here's a snapshot of all the past and present ProMontreal chairs who have helped shape and focus ProMontreal over the years. It is their guidance and dedication that inspire us. Ten cheers for these thirteen people. We can all look forward to a bright future for young people in Montreal thanks to their contribution and hard work (even though they all look like they're having fun!).

JAMIE ELMAN - FRONT, RIGHT

Jamie Elman sits on his balcony, cell phone in hand, feet up, the famous "Hollywood" sign is in plain view. If you didn't know him any better, you'd think that he was your typical American Hollywood actor. But the first 3 minutes of our conversation convinced me otherwise. Aside from the fact that I can make out the distinct sounds of The Tragically Hip in the background, Jamie hits me with a statement that only a Montrealer can. "You know what I'd love right now?" Jamie asks me. "Nothing in the world would satisfy me more this afternoon than a Schwartz's old fashioned (medium) smoked meat sandwich, with an order of fries, a pickle, and a Cott Black Cherry."

Jamie Elman left Montreal for L.A. 3 years ago in search of a professional acting career. "I loved everything about Montreal. I was shooting Student Bodies there, I lived downtown on Durocher, I lived in the Plateau for a little while, my family and friends were there, and the decision to leave was the hardest one I ever had to make."

After 3 years in Los Angeles, Jamie has had his most productive month to date. "At times is was hard. It was very uncertain, very unstable, and not a lot of routine. The key to surviving in L.A. is being persistent and surrounding yourself with people who you feel comfortable with, and who support you. There were hard times, and finally it paid off."

When Jamie least expected it, it happened! While shooting a film in Montreal, he got a call from his agent who informed him that he was asked to audition for a new NBC drama called "American Dreams". Jamie flew back to L.A., and successfully auditioned for a guest starring role. With similarities to his own personality, Jamie plays the part of Luke Foley, a piano teacher and record store clerk who attempts to open the mind of

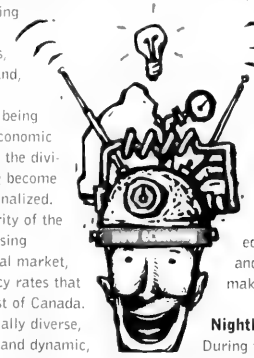
Montreal Pendulum

The last 25 years have been challenging for Montreal, to say the least. Sovereignty debates, high taxes and harsh winters caused an undeniable exodus. The silver lining for those left behind was low housing costs, smaller traffic jams and, a lower cost of living.

These benefits are being eroded as the city's economic tortures improve, and the divisive politics of the PQ become more and more marginalized. The returning popularity of the city is evidenced by rising prices in the residential market, and apartment vacancy rates that are lower than the rest of Canada. Culturally rich, ethnically diverse, economically modern and dynamic, Montreal has a unique atmosphere.



The New Economy

Montreal is becoming a leader in the realm of the "new economy", where the raw material is knowledge and the main tool is technology. The city has a high concentration of researchers in fields such as multimedia, biotechnology, and information technology. Enter-prises can rely on a highly educated, bilingual labor force, a product of our prominent universities and low tuition fees.

The Quebec government offers attractive tax incentives to corporations. Support is offered to start-up businesses in the form of a five-year Quebec "tax holiday". Investment in manufacturing and computer equipment is encouraged, as the purchaser is entitled to a 125% tax write-off. Research and development activities in Quebec are promoted with generous tax credits. There are further Quebec grants available to assist companies in acquiring equipment, upgrading technology, financing marketing plans, and job creation. The government has suggested that it wishes to make Quebec corporate taxes the lowest in the country.

Nightlife and Culture

During the day, the downtown core of Montreal is a thriving centre of business operations that span the globe. At night, the heart of downtown Montreal throbs with a nightlife that appeals to everyone, with hundreds of clubs, bars, and cafes. Montreal is one of the gastronomic capitals of North America, recognized for its varied cuisine to satisfy every taste, from French cuisine, to Italian, Oriental, and Jewish specialties. A cultural centre, the city plays host to festivals celebrating humour, jazz, and film. Montreal is also a popular filming location. Old Montreal is sought after for its architecture, which is reminiscent of older American and European cities. The four distinct seasons allow for a constantly changing menu of activities winter months are enjoyed with skiing, sledding, and skating, and summer months are filled with swimming, cycling, or a nature walk in Mount-Royal Park.

The signs of the renaissance of this great city are evident everywhere, if you don't believe me come witness it yourself.

Montreal: a city for the senses

The assignment seemed simple enough – write a few paragraphs about what makes Montreal so special. At different times in my career, I have written about space missions, plant biology and Ukrainian politics – things I know little about – so how hard could it be to write about the city I have called home for all but three weeks of my life?

It turns out that capturing the spirit of a city on paper is not an easy task.

Let us start with the obvious then.

Montreal is certainly known the world over as a world-class metropolis, cemented into the world's psyche by the 1967 World's Fair and as host of the Summer Olympics just nine years later. But long before that, perhaps as far back as Jacques Cartier's discovery of Mount Royal in 1534, Montreal has served as a gateway to North America – a launch pad for Canada's fur traders and a new home for hundreds of thousands of immigrants.

Today, Montreal is a vibrant community of 3.4 million people, a melting pot of languages and cultures and a centre of commerce and finance. The economy is strong and diversified, with the city's four universities providing highly-skilled talent for a growing network of high-tech companies. Montreal is home to 110,000 high-tech jobs, including 40 per cent of Canada's pharmaceutical industry. It is one of the leading centres of aviation and aerospace in all of North America. Cranes are sprouting up all over the city as developers rush to complete new office towers and shopping centres.

To witness Montreal's remarkable comeback from the North American recession of the nineties, one need only look at Rue Ste. Catherine – the commercial spine of Montreal. Gone are the rows of boarded up shops and "For Rent" signs, replaced by high-fashion boutiques, trendy restaurants and giant entertainment complexes. Even the empty Eaton's and Simpson's stores, landmarks from a bygone era, have been resurrected as new shopping and entertainment destinations.

But to capture the spirit of Montreal is to think about much more than census figures and economic barometers. From the cobblestone streets of Old Montreal to throngs of pedestrians on the downtown streets, Montreal is a city that brings out the best in your senses. It's the breathtaking view of the city's skyline as you cross the St. Lawrence River on the Champlain Bridge. It's the smell of hot bagels being flipped out of the oven at your favourite bagel shop. It's the taste of an ice-cold Orange Julep on a muggy August night. It's the cacophony of languages you pick up on a street corner on St. Laurent Blvd.

And speaking of St. Laurent – the Main -- is there anything more Montreal than darting into Schwartz's delicatessen for a smoked meat on rye, with an order of dill and a Black Cherry?

In 1534, Jacques Cartier sailed down the St. Lawrence River, spied the Indian village of Hochelaga at the base of a modest hill, and dubbed the area Mont Réal for its spectacular mountain. If the French explorer were to revisit the city that has grown from that spot, he would no doubt agree that he had chosen the right name.

a helping hand

When Jordy Reichson first started volunteering for the St. John Ambulance service, he admits that his intentions were anything but altruistic. What he really wanted was to see rock concerts and hockey games for free, and if that meant learning CPR and toting around a first-aid kit, then so be it.

But 10 years into his stint with the organization, it is the ability to provide emergency care to the sick and injured that has consumed Reichson, whether it be at a Montreal Canadiens hockey game, a sold-out Rolling Stones concert or a sedate art show.

Last fall, Reichson's contributions to the St. John Ambulance were recognized when he was inducted as a member of the The Most Venerable Order of the Hospital of St. John of Jerusalem – one of the more prestigious honours bestowed upon volunteers of the 900-year old organization. The induction ceremony took place at an Ottawa church and was followed by a reception hosted by Governor General Adrienne Clarkson at her official residence on Sussex Drive.

Although more than 200 Canadians were inducted into the Order, Reichson, 28, was one of the youngest honourees.

Since joining St. John Ambulance in 1993, Reichson has been posted to hundreds of community and sporting events. He and his colleagues at Division 777 are responsible for Montreal's West Island suburbs, include Ville St. Laurent, while all nine of the city's divisions share duties for events at the Bell Centre. Calls range from checking up on spectators who have been hit by a deflected hockey puck to administering care at the outset of a medical emergency.

"When security calls us over, we never know what to expect," he says. "You could be asked to give someone a Band-aid, or you could be responding to somebody in cardiac arrest."

But Reichson, who also volunteers with a first-responder unit, says it is the uncertain nature of the work and the ability to help those in need that keeps him coming back for more.

"There's something special about helping someone out when they're most vulnerable," he says. "They need help, they're unsure what has happened to them and they look to us to figure out what kind of care is required," he says.

Yet despite his penchant for helping others, Reichson says he never considered a career in medicine. By day, he sells computers.

"My mother, like any typical Jewish mother, always wondered why I didn't become a doctor," he says. "But I like treating people at the scene, in an uncontrolled environment. I'd rather let people who are smarter than me take care of them once they get to the hospital."

flirting with disaster

by STACEY BERMAN

It was Friday night and I was alone. I sat amidst a heap of worn invitations to the various events that promised to brighten a dark, cold Montreal winter evening: dinner parties, Matzah Ball, Speed Dating, book launches, play readings, coffee clubs, play readings in coffee clubs. But none held their luminous spell longer than the time it took to slice open the shimmering, cheerful envelopes and shake out the delicately-monogrammed cards.

I had already done The Matzah Ball and had found it too be too starchy and bloating. Speed Dating was fun, but I had learned from experience that, while it may take just seven minutes to meet a man, far more time is needed to rid oneself of a mismatch. Dinner parties were growing repetitive, as were overblown cultural events that somehow seemed to be bereft of culture. And one more purchase of an acquaintance's hastily self-published book would cement my status as a philanthropist of the arts. In boredom, in frustration, I gathered the various sheets of embossed paper and tossed them in the air. But as they landed in a scattered mess, one shiny, compelling, artfully-decorated envelope caught my eye. It was an invitation to a house warming. I reasoned that, at the very least, I was guaranteed good food and a comfortable couch, so I decided to tuck away my self-imposed winter blahs and head East for the night.

As I arrived, I was greeted with a house full of friendly smiles, beautiful decor, bright lights, and the comforting scents of mulled wine and honey cake. Eager to shake off the chill of the night, I joined a quiet group gathered around the fireplace. Next to me sat a lone, attractive man who was unencumbered either by a ring or a woman on his arm. A shy introduction begat sparkling repartée, which begat a four-hour-long conversation about film and government and The Simpsons and Phil Hartman — first alone, then with a crowd, then alone amongst the crowd, until our pyjama-clad hosts politely showed us the door.

The night was beautiful and crisply cool, so we continued our discussion as we set off on foot. By the time we hit St. Lawrence Blvd., the night air had given way to a temperate morning. So we declined a row of cabs and proceeded west, lost in laughter and charm and makeshift impressions of Krusty The Klown and Hanukkah Harry and Rhoda. An exchange of phone numbers under the buzzing streetlight near his apartment building and a promise to explore the city further, and I was off, alone but not lonely. As I made my way home, with the slowly-rising sun bathing the streets in a soft, warm glow, I realized that it is impossible not to be happy and hopeful in the city. Because in Montreal, you're always just one glittering invitation away from the Next Big Thing.

Montreal: A land of opportunity

by LOIS LIVERMAN

So the job market bites... or does it? There are jobs out there if you know where to look. Let's not dwell on high tech layoffs but examine what Montreal has to offer to those in the know.

Montreal is booming in a number of sectors. Montreal leads North America as a good place to invest for companies in the fast growing field of biomedical research. Our operating costs are low. A recent survey by Boyd Co., a consultancy based in Princeton N.J., examined 48 cities in Canada and the US. We came out ahead of the bunch in labour costs, wages and benefits, electricity, leasing rates etc. In other words, biomed firms love to open up for business here and are getting the investment capital to do it.

Montreal's standard claim to fame is its strength in Research and Development. In a city which boasts four world-class universities associated with eight teaching hospitals and other research centres, it is not hard to see that the talent is here.

The high tech industries including aeronautics, traditionally strong, are, at present, a bit weak. So is telecommunications. Those sectors will turn around, but not right now.

Pharmaceutical companies are hiring. They hire not only researchers but business types such as project and product managers.

The health sector is desperate for doctors, nurses, and para-professionals. Teachers are in high demand now and the shortage will be felt for some years to come. The social service industries always have openings at various levels, and if you are a fundraiser, the non-profit sector, universities and health institutions are more than willing to talk to you.

Last spring, the finance sector for example was not only hiring, (springing back from a disastrous year post 9/11) but hiring at very competitive salaries for new university graduates.

And Sales. There's always room for good salespeople. Call centres, manufacturers, retailers. Brush up on your language skills, on your smile and your shmooze appeal. There is always a place for a salesman who can bring in business.

So you see, Montreal has more to offer than just its great skyline, bagels, and St. Denis. So much more.

10 years of success!

To Judith Leichter, our proofreader par excellence, Cathy Oiknine, David Janowski, translator and Ryan Blau, photographer, milles merci!

People often ask how we always manage to look so good, so cool, so original and for so long. Very special thanks and all the credit goes to Barbara Rosenstein, of Studio Duotone, whose understanding and commitment to the magazine and whose talent and creativity go way beyond normal.

The true unsung hero is Rhona Veisfeld, whose relentless pursuit of those who miss deadlines, attention to detail and everything else concerning this magazine and the rest of my professional life, make it all come together.
Rho, thanks.

To our advertisers and sponsors, both current and past, our INfluential Friends, and our Yellow Big Page subscribers, there is no doubt, we would not be in business without you. We need and appreciate each of you. I must mention just three companies whose support of the magazine has been our financial backbone from day one and remain so until the present: the Richter Group, Schlesinger Newman Goldman and Cimtel. Thank you!

The ProMontreal Team is responsible for so many of the story ideas. Special thanks to Gail Grief, Natou Suissa, Tali Chemtob, Lori Anders, Leah Herzfeld, and Carole, Fabienne and Terry. To Danyael Cantor, Executive VP of FEDERATION CJA and my boss, thanks for your support.

Special mention to our partner agencies in the community; Bronfman Israel Experience Centre, Hillel, Centre Hillel, Centre communautaire juif, Sephardic Educational Centre, Jewish Public Library, Jewish Family Services, Jewish Vocational Services, Jewish Information and Referral Services, who feed us ideas and advertise when budgets allow or faithfully contribute to our upcoming events calendar when they don't.

A very special thanks to our readers who, time and again, responded to our surveys or simply told us how much they enjoy reading the articles, finding out what's going on, and learning what young people are doing. Thanks to our so-called readers who admit that they don't really read many articles, but love to look at the pictures – see who they know and what they are up to.

Thanks to all the people who have been featured for doing such interesting things and allowing us to tell their story.

So... have our young people been inspired and informed? Have they been helped to build a future in our great city and to contribute to our great community? Has our older generation been reminded of the amazing things our young people are doing? Have our community and our city benefited? I truly hope so and I truly believe so.

Join me in feeling proud of this great little magazine called InMontreal!

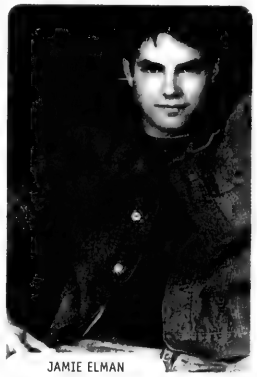
Meg Pryor (Brittany Snow) to the sounds of Bob Dylan. As time moves on, a relationship begins to unfold between Luke and Meg, and it is evident that there is an attraction between the two.

In its debut season, "American Dreams" has proven to be a successful drama, which has not only built up a following in the U.S., but right here in Canada as well. "It's so heartwarming, because I feel so far away from Montreal, so to get support from home is amazing! I've also had support from the Montreal media which makes me realize that Montreal is the type of community that supports its own, and is proud when a local boy makes good!"



JAMIE ELMAN

As we continue talking about Montreal, the excitement in Jamie's voice turns up a notch, as he talks about the best night life in the world, the greatest city to enjoy quality food, and the tight Jewish community that he still feels a part of.

"Jewish Montreal was such a part of my life growing up. I went to JPPS and Bialik, I went to the Y Country Camp, was a part of Hillel and went on the March of the Living." Jamie waxes nostalgic, "Doing plays at Bialik was one of the first times I realized that acting is a career that I wanted to pursue, so no matter where I end up, Montreal will be always be a major part of my life." At the moment, Jamie is shooting his 8th episode of American Dreams, and it looks like he'll be riding it out for the season. When I ask Jamie if he ever sees himself living in Montreal again, he takes a long pause..."You know what?" he says, "For as long as I live, I'll always feel like Montreal is home. I always dreamed of raising a family there, and having my kids grow up in the same environment that I did in Montreal, so you never know!" Now that's a Canadian dream.

The birthright israel trips, funded in part by Montreal philanthropist Charles Bronfman, tend to catch the more unaffiliated Jews. Since the program's inception nearly three years ago, more than 1,000 Montrealers aged 18 to 26 have taken part in the birthright experience – one of the highest per-capita rates in North America.

Upon their return to Montreal, birthright participants are encouraged to become involved with Jewish community organizations. "We don't force anything on them," Szlak says. "They come to us and we help them find their niche."

Other than birthright trips, young Montrealers who want to visit Israel can choose from several options, including the March of the Living for high school students and volunteer programs such as Kefiada and Magen David Adom. The Israel Experience Centre also awarded 39 scholarships during the past two years to Montrealers who wanted to study at Yeshivot and universities in Israel.

The results of these efforts are easy to spot. Last spring, about 20,000 people thronged into Montreal's downtown streets for a rally in support of Israel's independence. And just this past December, Montreal high school students sent 2,000 postcards to soldiers serving in the Israel Defence Forces.

And for some Montrealers, their love for Israel is so overwhelming that it can only be satisfied with the ultimate move – Aliyah. One group of 18 Montrealers are set to pack their bags in tandem next August and relocate to Beer Sheva, Montreal's twin city under the Partnership 2000 project. Arie Levy, spokesman for the Group Magshimim, says the Aliyah is designed to emulate the mass Aliyot undertaken by Israel's first pioneers during the years preceding and following independence, when entire groups of friends or large extended families would immigrate to Israel together.

"We think it's an ideal way for people to move to Israel," says Levy, 23. "It will make it easier for all of us to integrate to life in Israel."

For Ruth Benyayer, 24, relocating to Israel represents the culmination of a lifelong dream she has had ever since she first visited her Israeli cousins when she was 11 years old. She has been back to Israel five times since.

"Ever since that first trip, Israel has grown in my heart and in my mind," she says. "I can't think of a single time in my life when Israel wasn't an integral part of my life."

And there are tens of thousands of Montreal Jews who share that sentiment.

Mulroney slams Liberals over Israel

Opens conference on anti-Semitism

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Critical of Canadian government policies during the Holocaust and more recently of its stand on Israel, former prime minister Brian Mulroney opened an academic conference on anti-Semitism with a passionate keynote speech Sunday night.

"Anti-Semitism, in my judgment, is born in ignorance and nurtured in envy," Mulroney told more than 150 people at the University of Toronto, host of the two-day conference Anti-Semitism: The Politicization of Prejudice in the Contemporary World.

Brian Mulroney

"It is the stepchild of delusion and evil."

He said contemporary anti-Semitism has made Israel a primary target and that Islamic and Arab extremists and others have "domesticated Europe's anti-Semitic themes.

"Israel has in effect become the new Jew," he said.

But "this does not mean that Israel should be immune from criticism," he added.

Chastising Canadian native leader David Ahenakew for the remarks he made last December to a journalist in Saskatoon, in which Ahenakew said Adolf Hitler had the right idea, Mulroney said Ahenakew's comments "testify to the intractability of the problem.

"As one grappling with what accounts for anti-Semitism's persistence, one is distressed by its incomprehensible resilience," he said.

He urged Canadian politicians at every level to not be ambivalent about anti-Semitism.

The News in Brief

CANADA

New Scholarship

TORONTO — The Fraser Institute announced a new scholarship fund last month that will provide up to 50 per cent of tuition to 150 Ontario private school students in financial need in each of the next three years. Starting next September and continuing in 2004 and 2005, grants from the Children First: School Choice Trust, worth up to $3,500 annually, will be open to students up to Grade 8, who will be eligible to receive them until they reach eighth grade. The program is being run by the Fraser Institute, a Vancouver-based conservative think-tank, and funded by the Toronto-based W. Garfield Weston Foundation. For applications, call 1-866-924-8881 or visit www.childrenfirstgrants.ca.

Arson Suspects Sought

OTTAWA — The Ottawa police arson squad is seeking information on three males in connection with what it says was a deliberately set fire last month at the Jewish Youth Library in the city's west end, the Ottawa Citizen reported. Police said the blaze is related to others in the area in December involving three males.

ISRAEL

PA To Pay Egged

JERUSALEM — An Israeli court has ordered the Palestinian Authority and its president, Yasser Arafat, to pay the Egged bus co-operative nearly $11 million (US) for lost income from terror attacks on Israeli buses. It also ruled that a lien be taken out on tax moneys the PA was to receive from Israel. Since the current intifadah began in 2000, Egged buses have been targeted in 53 attacks that killed some 200 people, the plaintiffs charged.

Corruption Ranking

JERUSALEM — Israel dropped to 18th place in a 2002 global corruption report by Transparency International (TI), a Berlin-based non-profit institute. The higher a state's ranking, the less prevalent corruption is. In 2001, Israel was 16th, after climbing from 22nd in 2000. The annual measure, calculated from polls and estimates by academics, businesspeople and analysts, ranges from 10 points – the least level of corruption – to zero. For 2002, TI ranked 102 countries, and Israel and Germany both scored a 7.2, ahead of Belgium, Japan and Spain. Finland ranked first.

Negev Mosque Razed

JERUSALEM — An Israeli Arab MK warned of repercussions after Israel demolished a mosque last week in a Bedouin village in the Negev. Because the village is unrecognized by the state, no construction is allowed in it, and the building was declared illegal, Ha'aretz reported. Talab El-Sana said the demolition "could lead to a public uprising."

WORLD

Iran Five 'on Vacation'

LOS ANGELES — The last five Jews still held in an Iranian prison have been released on "vacation," although it remains uncertain whether they will be permanently freed. The five were among 13 Jews arrested in early 1999 for allegedly spying for Israel. In a case that drew worldwide attention, they were tried in the southern city of Shiraz, and 10 received prison sentences. Five have already been released after serving some of their time. Israel denies they were its spies.

$1 Billion Paid

NEW YORK — The Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany (Claims Conference) has paid more than $1 billion (US) in Holocaust-related compensation to 58,716 Jewish Holocaust survivors in 39 countries under its Article 2 Fund since 1995, it announced last month. The Claims Conference negotiated the Article 2 Fund's creation with Germany in the early 1990s to pay survivors who had been unable to apply, or were ineligible for previous German government payments. In Canada, 2,962 survivors have received payments.

Umpire Out

VERO BEACH, Fla. — A major league baseball umpire has received a second punishment after referring to umpires administrator Cathy Davis as a "stupid Jew bitch" in a phone call with baseball officials last month. Suspended for 10 days without pay for the slur, Bruce Froemming was told to stay away from the Los Angeles Dodgers' adult baseball camp that began last week in Vero Beach, Fla. Froemming made the remark after being chastised for not letting the major league office handle his travel plans for an umpiring trip to Japan. He later apologized.

Ramon Memorial Fund Established

TORONTO — UIA Federations Canada has set up a memorial fund in the name of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon, who was to be buried Tuesday at Moshav Nahalal in the Galilee.

Donations can be made through local federations and will be distributed according to the wishes of Ramon's family. To make a donation in Toronto, contact UJA Federation of Greater Toronto at 416-631-5685.

Among Canadian memorials for Ramon, who died Feb. 1 when the space shuttle Columbia disintegrated on its return to Earth, the Winnipeg arm of the Jewish National Fund dedicated its annual telethon, held the day after the disaster, in his memory, CJN correspondent Myron Love reported.

During his flight, Ramon said he wanted to see 14 million trees – one for every Jew – planted in Israel on the anniversary of his launch. The telethon in Winnipeg, the twin city of Ramon's hometown Be'er Sheva, sold 1,400 trees, and calls flooded in last week from the wider community after local media reported on the campaign.

E-mail condolences to Ramon's family can be sent via the Israel Defence Forces to ilanfamily@mail.idf.il.

Businessman encouraging investment in Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's no secret that Israel has been going through a particularly rough patch in recent years. Not only is the security situation difficult, but the constant violence or threat of violence has dealt the Israeli economy a crippling blow.

Toronto businessman Izzy Kaplan believes he's hit upon an idea that will, at least in a small way, help the Israeli economy while boosting Israelis' morale and cementing relations between Toronto's Jewish community and Israel.

Kaplan, owner of Israel's The Judaica Centre, is promoting a project that would see local Jews purchase homes in Israel as either an investment, a retirement home or as a home base when visiting Israel. Kaplan believes if he can convince at least 25 people to invest, he will have attained the critical mass necessary to go ahead with the project.

With that minimum number of investors, Kaplan said, the Canadians will be able to negotiate a better deal with Israeli builders for the purchase of residential units in the new city of Modiin.

Real estate developers in Modiin are sitting on unsold units and are eager to make a sale, Kaplan said. A variety of units are available ranging from one-bedroom apartments of 90 square metres (970 square feet) to three-bedroom units of 140 square metres (1,500 square feet). Detached homes known in Israel as "cottages" are also available.

Prices for the units are well below the cost of equivalent homes in either Tel Aviv or Jerusalem and each city is only a short drive away, Kaplan said. For instance, a one-bedroom unit in Modiin can be had for around $100,000 U.S. and a three-bedroom home for approximately $180,000 U.S.

Kaplan said he has been in touch with an Israeli bank and he believes that if the project is successful, the group can negotiate mortgage rates of 4.5 per cent based on a 25 per cent down payment and a 25-year term. At that cost, a unit becomes easily affordable or easily rentable for those who are looking at it as strictly an investment, he said.

He determined that Modiin offered the best value

Kaplan has met with the mayor of Modiin, who is enthusiastic about the project, and he has put together a three-person team in Modiin to help market it to visitors. Sheri Wright-Pilo, an oleh from the Hamilton area, is part of the team, he said.

The idea of investing in Israel came to him in a rather oblique way. A regular visitor to Israel for both business and personal reasons, Kaplan has been looking into the Israeli real estate market for a number of years. With his frequent visits, it was beginning to make sense to him to have a home base in the country. What's more, his son and daughter-in-law who live in Israel have been encouraging him to take the plunge.

After some investigation into other locations, he determined that Modiin offered the best value with the best potential resale price. It's a bedroom community of 32,000 people, many of them young professionals and Anglos who work elsewhere. It was designed by renowned architect Moshe Safdie and it is nestled in the Jerusalem hills halfway between Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

So far, Kaplan has been circulating his idea by word of mouth. He's been promoting it actively at his shul, the B'nai Torah. Coincidentally, Kaplan points out, many of the shul's members have children living in Israel. He's hoping that the Modiin project will appeal to those who travel to Israel often to visit their children, but he's also promoting it to people from other congregations and with other interests.

"If you want to come in at a digestible range, come in with us. We can be neighbours and it can build into a nice community," he said.

Some time in early March, he'll host an initial information meeting that will be open to the public. The misuse of words

Jewish tradition bids us to be very careful with the way we use words. "Guard your tongue from speaking evil and your lips from deceitful speech" (Psalms 34:14). That statement neatly encapsulates the unambiguous, precisely worded prohibition against deliberate or reckless untruthful speech and writing. The prohibition exemplifies a theme that courses through our long-standing traditions.

The rabbis understood the unique harm to reputation and to soul that can result from the carelessly, recklessly or deliberately inappropriate use of words. The famous analogy of spoken words as feathers tossed to the wind effectively makes the point about the irretrievability of errant comments. The harm, once occasioned, cannot totally be expunged.

But reckless or mischievous language also causes unique harm to truth, to the record of history, as it were. In the past 2½-year campaign against Israel and Jews, truth has been so pummelled and history's record so mangled, it is unrecognizable.

The distortions and the deceits reached their zenith, perhaps, at the United Nations conference against racism in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001, and were reiterated in odious variation some seven months later as harrowing, but fabricated tales of the "Jenin massacres."

The conclusion is therefore inescapable that the rhetorical seedlings of extreme anti-Israel propaganda that were sown in the United Nations immediately after the Six Day War by the large, automatic, Muslim-centred, Third World-supported, Soviet-sponsored majority of nations have sprouted into a revised history of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, an overgrown, tangled rainforest of lies and distortions which neither truth nor light seem able to pierce.

The underlying premises of the revised history are threefold: Jews as dispossessors; Israelis as oppressors; Jews and Israelis as all-powerful conspirators and racists.

The implications for Israel and its supporters of this wholesale mangling of truth and history are quite ominous.

To whom and how can we make the case of the justice of Israel's cause?

Having been exposed, for almost four decades now, to the revised "narrative" of Middle East history, even reasonable people, especially in the face of the unabating violence, having become ensnared by the clutching branches of the dark rainforest.

Two examples from the Globe and Mail last week illustrate the point.

In a commentary on the Globe's oped page on Monday, Feb. 3, veteran political analyst Jeffrey Simpson wrote about the "hubristic U.S. attempt to remake the Middle East," which is what Simpson sees as the chief rationale for U.S. president George W. Bush's determination to oust Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Simpson points out, as others have, that the U.S. administration believes a new, democratic government in Baghdad will open the door for more democracy throughout the Middle East, and will, in turn, lead quickly to a permanent resolution of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. There is nothing exceptional about Simpson's analysis until near its end, when he writes: "But however history is read, today's facts are that the Palestinians are without a state, their land has been sorely encroached on by Israeli settlers and Israel is led by a prime minister whose life's work has been to deny Palestinians that state."

This statement of "fact" is completely untrue. Setting aside the unravelling of the war in Lebanon, the original reason for which was to root out terrorists constantly shooting at Israeli citizens in northern Israel, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon served in the army, defending the lives of his people in 1956, 1967 and 1973. Those wars had to do with saving Israel and nothing to do with "denying the Palestinians their state."

The most regrettable disregard for truth in Simpson's analysis, however, came in his last paragraph: "But the Bush administration... allowed the Sharon government to guide U.S. policy, and knew it had to work with a Congress that would ask how high when the Israelis yelled jump."

Apart from being a gross insult to the legislators of the United States, the image that Simpson paints reinforces the dangerous canard of Jews as manipulators and all-powerful controllers of the unsuspecting gentile. In doing so, Simpson feeds the insatiable appetite of malign readers for more conspiracy theories about Jews.

In addition to the Simpson example of the usage of unfortunate language were the disturbing and highly offensive, but disguised falsifications in John Allemang's poem about Sharon in the previous Saturday's Globe.

In a vicious screed of contempt against Sharon, entitled The Angel Ariel, the writer conjures horrible images of babies dying and girls being raped and accuses Sharon of having committed a war crime. He also effectively describes suicide bombing as a model act of altruism.

Sufficient numbers of readers obviously complained because this past Saturday, the paper published something they called a "clarification," purporting to give the poem a context.

It did nothing of the sort. All it did was further prove how ignorance of, or worse, distortion of the truth, has now taken root in the minds of the people who have adopted the new, but false narrative of Middle East history.

"A word fittingly spoken is like apples of gold in settings of silver (Proverbs 25:11)."

Post editor sees good things come out of war in Iraq

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The United States needs to stick around after the war in Iraq and make sure democracy takes root, said Jonathan Kay, editorials editor of the National Post.

"By accomplishing its objectives and then getting right out, the weapons program would be resuscitated," Kay said at a recent executive meeting of Ontario Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Jonathan Kay

If the United States takes an interest in fostering a democratic culture, and doesn't see a victory in Iraq as just another notch under its belt, then other governments in the area would follow suit, he said.

That scenario would result in the beginning of the end of current Arab civilizations, and have a benign affect on the war on terror, he said.

Every time there is a conflict in the Middle East, the prospect of terrorism in Israel arises, he said.

The conflict in Iraq would come about two years after the beginning of the current Intifadah.

"The attacks are now less frequent, and there has been talk of a Hamas ceasefire. There is not much evidence that a war in Iraq would do much to resuscitate the Intifadah."

The last Intifadah also petered out after two years, he said.

In net terms, said Kay, a sacrifice in money and lives lost would be worth it if the United States stayed in the region.

"It's an inexact science. How long does it take for democracy to take root in a society that has never had a democracy? I hope the United States stays the course, because to get right out would be a disaster," he said.

The United States defines Iraq as a major threat, he said. "Once Iraq is liberated, then maybe it can deal more harshly with other [countries in the region.]

"When you get rid of a major enemy, you no longer have to compromise with others. The United States pals around with Saudi Arabia because it is seen as the lesser of the evils. That will change when Iraq is liberated.

"In the long, and even in the medium term, good things can come out of a successful conflict in Iraq," said Kay.

Also at the meeting, Bernie Farber, executive director, CJC, Ontario region, said the organization's 31st triennial plenary is set for March 30.

The day includes the premier's luncheon, forums on political advocacy, Israel advocacy, and a workshop on cyber-activism.

Those how pre-register, he said, are eligible to win a trip to Israel.

For the first time, he said, the plenary will be Webcast, so people across the province can join online. "We can reach out to the entire province and have them be with us," he said.

In other Congress business, CJC recently presented a brief to the Department of Foreign Affairs and International Trade (DFAIT), on the occasion of the annual non-governmental organizations (NGO) consultations.

The brief expressed a wide range of concerns on issues pertaining to the Middle East, worldwide anti-Semitism and terrorism.

Among its recommendations, the brief said that any examination of the human rights records during the past year in the Middle East must be seen through the prism of the current realities of the likelihood of war in Iraq and the Palestinian terror campaign against Israel and the ongoing rise of worldwide anti-Semitism.

Among other things, it also asked that Canada vote against one-sided anti-Israeli resolutions that: blame only Israel and its policies for the conflict with the Palestinians; indict Israel's counter-terrorism measures with no reference to or condemnation of Palestinian terrorism; deny or undermine Israel's right to exist as a democratic Jewish state in the Middle East.

It also asked that Canada strongly condemn Palestinian suicide bombing and terrorism, condemn the bombings as crimes against humanity and war crimes, and hold the Palestinian Authority accountable for acts of terrorism committed against Israelis.

Jury selection begins in Baranovski murder case

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Jury selection began last week in the Matti Baranovski murder case. A panel of 190 prospective jurors was assembled for the selection process in what Ontario Superior Court Justice David McCombs described as the largest courtroom in Canada.

The potential jurors were told the trial of three young men charged in the murder could take as long as four months. The three accused, Daniel Weiz, William Cochrane and Meir Mariani, are alleged to have murdered Baranovski on Nov. 14, 1999 in G. Ross Lord Park in North York.

McCombs instructed the jury panel they should not discuss the case with anyone, they should not attempt to research the case on the Internet and they should keep an open mind about the case.

The jury selection process was scheduled to continue through the week with the trial itself set to begin on Feb. 24.

Israel Election 2003

Mitzna should rebuff Sharon's overture

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's Labor party should rebuff Prime Minister Ariel Sharon's call for a national unity government if it truly wants to be seen as a genuine alternative, Israeli scholar David Newman says.

Yet, as he noted in an interview, important members in the party, such as Shimon Peres, the former foreign minister, wish to rejoin Sharon's old coalition.

At this point, the third-ranking party in the Knesset, Shinui, led by Yosef (Tommy) Lapid, is more likely to enter a unity government, Newman said.

"Shinui is more centrist than Labor and it wants a taste of power."

But if the United States invades Iraq and Iraq fires Scud missiles at Israel that cause serious casualties, the Labor leader, Amram Mitzna, who currently opposes Labor's inclusion in a Sharon cabinet, may bow to Sharon's wishes, he added.

Newman, founder and chair of Ben-Gurion University's political science department, suggested that Labor, with only 19 Knesset seats after the Jan. 28 election, is in a state of decline.

"In a sense, it has negotiated itself out of the political debate."

Citing the results of a recent survey, he said that Israelis under the age of 20 have indicated they would not vote for Labor.

Since 1977, when it defeated Labor for the first time, Likud has won more elections than Labor.

And Labor, with the exception of Yitzhak Rabin's term of office from 1992 to 1995, has failed to create "a true ideological alternative" to Likud.

"Labor has not learned how to be an opposition party," observed Newman, pointing to its tendency to join national unity governments.

Sharon is sincerely interested in forming a unity government. A realist, he realizes he will need Labor at his side when Israel eventually reopens talks with the Palestinians.

David Newman

Newman is convinced there is a pragmatic Palestinian leadership with whom Israel can negotiate in good faith.

Sharon's efforts to isolate and sideline Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat have backfired, he argued.

Future negotiations should be conducted on the basis of the Taba talks, which ended shortly after the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

Sharon's notion of a small, territorially disconnected Palestinian state is not something either the Israeli left or the Palestinians themselves can accept.

But the fact that he appears ready to discuss Palestinian statehood is encouraging, he acknowledged.

Nevertheless, Newman does not regard Sharon as a leader who will sign a formal peace agreement with the Palestinians.

"What he would offer would not be sufficient."

The momentum toward Palestinian statehood will be immeasurably slowed if terrorism continues, Newman warned.

"The only solution is a two-state solution, but there is a limit to what you can do when you're being bombarded by suicide bombers."

Arafat does not exert the control he once had over groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad. But the Israeli army has destroyed much of the terrorist infrastructure in the Palestinian autonomous areas.

Newman said that a trusteeship of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip under American, United Nations and European Union auspices may be necessary before the establishment of a Palestinian state.

"This could help convince Israelis to accept a two-state solution."

In any event, there is already a growing Israeli consensus of the inevitability of a Palestinian state.

"Sharon has partially moved toward it."

Israel Election 2003

'Labor party is needed for stability'

Newly re-elected Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon cannot form a stable government without the backing of the Labor party, according to Israeli analyst Shmuel Segev.

Sharon, the Likud party leader, needs a strong cabinet because Israel is in the midst of a severe recession and because of the prospect of a resumption of peace talks with the Palestinians, he said.

Segev, a lecturer, writer and former newspaper foreign correspondent who currently divides his time between Tel Aviv and Winnipeg, spoke at a Shaarei Shomayim Congregation forum last week.

It was sponsored by Shaarei Shomayim's Israel Action Committee, the Canada-Israel Committee and the Israel Now Consortium.

Claiming that mainstream factions in Likud and Labor do not differ much over peace with the Palestinians, he said that only they can cobble together a government able to withstand political and economic turbulence.

He argued that Sharon cannot rely on smaller, mutually antagonistic parties for support.

"Every faction has something against the other," explained Segev, a former Ma'ariv reporter and author of Crossing the Jordan, a book about Israel's efforts to reach peace with its Arab neighbours.

Citing an example, Segev said that Sharon cannot depend on either the far right National Union or the National Religious Party, since both vehemently oppose the establishment of a Palestinian state.

As a result, Sharon must convince the Labor party, which bolted from cabinet last November after 19 months of cohabitation with Likud, to rejoin his national unity government.

In his view, Sharon is committed to the United States' Arab-Israeli peace plan – the road map - which Washington is poised to formally unveil.

The phased plan calls for a halt to Palestinian violence, a freeze in Israeli settlement activity in the territories, the creation of a provisional Palestinian state this year and of a full-fledged Palestinian state in 2005 after the completion of final status negotiations.

Segev speculated that the Bush administration will withhold $4 billion in emergency aid and a further $8 billion in loan guarantees unless Sharon accepts the road map in full.

Shmuel Segev

Likening the prospect of peace with the Palestinians to a dream, Segev said the best Israel can hope for now is a long-range interim agreement.

In an analysis of Israel's Jan. 28 general election, the fifth in 11 years, Segev ascribed the Labor party's poor showing to its identification with the failed Oslo peace process.

Labor's defection from Sharon's government, he observed, was inevitable, given its desire to present an alternative to Likud's rightist policies.

Turning to Labor's current leader, Amram Mitzna, Segev predicted he will not last long unless he moves to the centre.

In his judgment, Israel's political scene is being transformed by the presence of more than one million new Russian immigrants and by the growing numbers of Orthodox and haredi Jews.

The Russians, almost one-third of whom are non-Jews halachically, want to separate synagogue and state. Staunchly observant Jews yearn for an intensified Jewish spirit in Israel.

Sooner or later, he warned, Israel will have to deal with the tense relationship between secular and religious Jews.

Speaking of the Russians, Segev said that 35 per cent voted for Likud, while 12 per cent cast their ballots for Shinui, Yosef (Tommy) Lapid's fiercely secular party.

Segev, who has known Lapid for many years, described him as both fervently anti-religious and anti-Arab.

Segev called Israel B'Aliya's loss of two parliamentary seats an encouraging sign, signifying the growing integration of Russian immigrants into Israeli society.

The party's Russian-born leader, Natan Sharansky, a Sharon cabinet minister, resigned from the Knesset in the wake of the election and merged his party with Likud.

Today, we mourn as one.

A message from Jewish National Fund Leadership worldwide.

It is impossible to comprehend the void created as the best and the brightest—all seven Columbia astronauts—were chosen and then taken from us. But a clear message was etched into our consciousness by the explosion in the sky: We are one. It was in this spirit, "to emphasize the unity of the people of Israel and the Jewish community abroad," that astronaut Ilan Ramon went into space. He took with him a Torah scroll that survived the Holocaust, copy of a drawing by Petr Ginz, a 14-year-old who perished in Auschwitz, and the dedication to conduct research for the benefit of all mankind.

We, too, must dedicate ourselves to Ilan's mission. There is no better way to honor his extraordinary achievements and exceptional potential than by fulfilling the one request he made of us as he circled the Earth: "Plant a tree in Israel during the coming year." It was Ilan's dream, and a wish shared by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, to see 14-million seedlings in Israel growing skyward.

On behalf of Jewish National Fund's contributors and offices around the world, we honor the memory of astronauts Michael Anderson, David Brown, Kalpana Chawla, Laurel Clark, Rick Husband, William McCool and Ilan Ramon by bringing life to our planet and planting trees in the land of Israel.

Contradictions, inconsistencies, mockery

Sadly, but tellingly, the debate surrounding the best way to disarm Saddam Hussein of his weapons of mass destruction has transmogrified into a debate about American foreign policy. Thus, the much publicized anti-war protests that have been held recently in various cities across Europe and North America have descended into veritable festivals of derision against U.S. President George W. Bush.

Some demonstrators actually sympathize with Saddam Hussein as a mean, but misunderstood man-of-his-people being picked upon by the giant American bully. Some even lionize him as revolutionary, though aged; most simply ignore him, preferring to pour their wrath onto the more "deserving" target: America.

Forgotten by most of the anti-war protesters, as if they ever cared, was the fact that Saddam Hussein was already found, seven years ago, to be in contempt of the world, as it were, not to mention the neighbouring countries and the thousands of people whose lives he destroyed. Saddam was ordered, then, to destroy the weapons of mass destruction he was known to have. The regimen of UN-led inspections was put in place at that time to verify that he had done so.

That the inspections are still being negotiated with Saddam is a testament to the profound impotence and moral vacuity that characterizes the UN.

In the latest round of discussions last weekend between the UN weapons inspectors Hans Blix and Mohamed El Baradei and the Iraqi government, Blix effused to the press that the inspectors had been given "a number of papers relating to high-profile issues" including anthrax, VX and ballistic missiles. Yet, these were among the very materials which, before the weekend, Saddam denied having.

There was also a report last weekend that international aid agencies have begun preparing for the human catastrophes that might result from a war against the Iraqi regime. Specifically, these agencies were preparing for the possibility of having to deal with thousands of "contaminated people." They would be the victims of Saddam's scorched earth rampage of reprisal, civilians fleeing Iraq, on whom he would use his chemical and biological weapons in an effort to destabilize the countries towards whose borders they would be fleeing. The weapons that the agencies fear, and for whose frightful release they are wisely preparing, are the very ones Saddam vehemently denies having.

The anti-American, anti-war protesters always disregard the blatant contradictions and inconsistencies in the transparent, cat-and-mouse manoeuvres by Saddam. But their disregard of Saddam's dissembling and deceit serves only a twofold purpose. It pushes the possibility of Saddam's departure much further away; and it makes a mockery of the idea that the UN can "take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to international peace and security."

More on the Y's hours

I am writing to express my complete disagreement with Murray Dalfen (CJN, Jan. 23, Letters to the editor). Although the Y is not just a business, it relies on membership fees for a substantial part of its income. By closing on Saturdays and all Jewish holidays, including nights after the holidays, it deprives its users of services for more than almost 25 per cent of evenings.

Though I am an active Y member, I also frequent other fitness facilities on Saturdays and find many former Y members there who have quit in frustration because of its current hours policy. Others refuse to join the Y because of it, thus weakening this valuable community institution.

This policy does not unite the community but divides it. Those who want to use fitness facilities on Fridays and Saturdays must go elsewhere. Young people who would spend Friday night at the Y are left with no choice but to go to other fitness facilities where they may find non-Jewish partners.

The Y's current policy discourages the fitness of our community and encourages assimilation. The irony is that those who would not use the facility anyway on Saturday are preventing those who would use it from doing so.

I believe the Y, which also received tax examption from the city in exchange for being open to all citizens on a daily basis, must be open every day to meet the needs of the entire Jewish community. That would be a truly unifying message.

More on the Y's hours (2)

Regarding "CJC-Q votes to keep Y closed on Shabbat" (CJN, Feb. 6), Canadian Jewish Congress board member Jeffrey Boro is quoted as saying, "The majority [of Montreal Jews] may not follow Orthodoxy, but they somehow believe in it." In my humble opinion, Boro could not be more wrong. I do not recall Boro being voted as our spokesman by the majority of Montreal Jews. If we do not follow Orthodoxy, it is precisely because we do not believe in it.

Boro continues by saying: "Orthodox Jews... kept Judaism alive for 6,000 years." Perhaps, Boro should give some credit to Conservative, Reform and Reconstuctionist Jews who are helping to keep Judaism alive today, as well. It would be nice if such appointed leaders of the Jewish community such as Boro refrain in the future from telling us what we think. He should show us a modicum of respect and just speak for himself.

Memorialize righteous gentiles, too

I noted with particular interest and considerable anguish the half-page ad by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem (CJN, Feb. 6) urging "members of the Jewish community to provide names of loved ones" who were murdered in the Holocaust. These are to be "carved on eight granite walls surrounding the Holocaust Monument" in Toronto's Earl Bales Park.

As a child survivor whose father, grandparents, aunts, uncles and a cousin perished in the concentration camps and open pits in Galicia, I should feel grateful for this opportunity to memorialize them. Indeed, they have been remembered and honoured in different ways and in different places, including Yad Vashem in Jerusalem.

My distress stems from the fact that I have been repeatedly denied the opportunity to honour, at this memorial, those righteous gentiles who, over a period of years, risked life and limb to save my life, and the lives of my mother and my sisters. I particularly wish to do so in the non-Jewish diaspora where I live.

Ever since this ad first appeared a few years ago I was told that there was no room for this on the monument. Eventually, I was informed that there would be a portion of the monument devoted to the "Righteous amongst the Nations," and so in fact there is. But it only includes the names and exploits of a few high- profile, courageous individuals such as Raoul Wallenberg.

I find it ironic that there was room to list the names of people who donated money for this project, and who are thankfully alive today. Why, however, am I and other survivors in this community, not afforded the opportunity of paying the requisite $180 per line to pay public tribute to those few other individuals who were truly a "light among the nations"? Why indeed?

Condolences to the Ramon family

I'd like to offer my warmest condolences to the Jewish community and to the family of Ilan Ramon who died in service of humanity. His loss is a great tragedy for everyone in the world. May his soul rest in peace and eternity in our hearts. Amen. Shalom.

Ilan Ramon: In Memoriam

Pillar of cloud by day, pillar of fire by night, that's how He led them to the promised land,
but not Ilan Ramon, for whom the pillar of cloud joined with the pillar of fire to eat him alive.
When Ilan Ramon soared into space aboard the shuttle Columbia, he said if not a mezuzah, then the shema, if not the shema, then some kosher chicken,
if not that, God and the Jewish people, and the radio message he sent back as the sun rose and set over Israel was like the Passover prayer of thanks:
had You only taken us from Egypt,
only given us Sinai, only fed us manna, had You but hallowed us with the Sabbath
it would have been enough, but You brought us to the chosen land and built us the chosen temple and enjoined us to behave according to the chosen word:
let Me not on your account hear the cry of the afflicted, but work to make life better.
And so every year we say
we are the Exodus, we are at Sinai, we are going home and we shall be faithful.
Ilan Ramon left the earth,
Ilan Ramon did not come home,
but Ilan Ramon was faithful and now he too has become like the pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night that shall not depart from before his people.

Free and fair elections cannot be held in dictatorships

By MURRAY TEITEL

It is unlikely that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation (CBC) radio host who interviewed Palestinian cabinet minister, Saeb Erekat, on the morning of Monday Dec. 23, 2002 was aware of the summer 2002 edition of the journal Azure which contained an article by Daniel Polisar called Yasser Arafat and the Myth of Legitimacy.

The interview concerned the cancellation by the Palestinian Authority (PA) of presidential and legislative elections scheduled for January 2003, a decision that Erekat, true to his philosophy of not letting facts get in the way of good propaganda, blamed on the Israeli occupation of parts of the West Bank since March 29, 2002 in response to an escalation of terrorist attacks.

Erekat failed to mention that Palestinian municipal elections scheduled for July 1996 and elections that should have been held prior to May 4, 1999 (when Arafat and his council's term ended) also did not take place, despite the absence of Israeli troops at those times. And, as in all CBC interviews of Palestinian spokespersons, embarrassing details were not raised.

Polisar had headed the observer team Peace Watch, a non-partisan Israeli organization accredited by the PA as an official observer of the 1996 Palestinian "election" in which Arafat received 87.3 per cent of the votes cast and his Fatah faction ended up in control of 67 of the 88 seats on the legislative council. Polisar's meticulously detailed article runs to 38 pages, 16 of which are devoted to 161 footnotes.

The article should be required reading for anyone who thinks that a free and fair election can be held in a dictatorship. If the presence of the Israeli army in the West Bank is indeed preventing the Palestinians from voting in another fraudulent election, then they should be thankful to Israel for sparing them the additional repression and intimidation that will accompany this exercise in futility. Since as minister of municipal government affairs, Erekat was responsible for preparing the elections, it is unfortunate that the CBC did not take advantage of his presence to gain firsthand knowledge of the abuses Polisar has documented.

Polisar exhaustively demonstrates that the 1996 election was a sham, not so much because of election-day abuses, but because of what had occurred in the 20 months before it. In that time, Arafat signed an agreement with Israel permitting him to set up a civil administration in the West Bank and Gaza. He worked feverishly to create a dictatorship that would ensure there would be no viable opposition to him or his Fatah faction by the time an election was held. He appointed a 24-member "cabinet" from among his loyalists and, though limited by the agreement signed with Israel to a police force of 9,000, had by 1995 appointed 22,000 policemen, creating what Amnesty International called possibly the highest ratio of police-to-civilian population in the world.

Arafat's government apparatus was turned into a large patronage machine. By February 1995, it included 830 directors general (one for every 19 workers), all appointed in Arafat's name. Arafat personally controlled economic activity through the awarding of monopoly concessions. He appointed judges on the basis of loyalty to him, not legal expertise. In Jericho, Erekat appointed a colonel with no legal experience to head the civil court. According to a senior official of the International Commission of Jurists, the colonel decided cases on the basis of his personal views rather than the letter of the law. Arafat's control of the judges ensured that their personal views reflected his own. But sometimes even this was not enough. One man accused of plotting against Arafat had been before the civil courts for three months without "progress." Accordingly, a High Court for State Security was established, which held secret trials in the middle of the night and rendered verdicts in 15 minutes.

At the time when Arafat assumed control, the West Bank and Gaza had the freest press in the Arab world. But unwilling to tolerate criticism of himself or his regime, Arafat silenced his media critics through intimidation and brute force. In July 1994, staff at a-Nahar received verbal and written threats from the Fatah organization in Jerusalem and saw distribution of their paper banned in the Gaza Strip and severely restricted in the West Bank. The night editor of al-Quds, Maher al-Alami, was summoned to Jericho by Col. Jibril Rajoub, head of the Preventive Security Service, for running a pro-regime piece on page 8 instead of on page 1. The colonel told al-Alami that if he didn't come, he'd be hacked to pieces, put in the trunk of Rajoub's car and brought to Jericho that way. Al-Alami was interrogated and held for nearly a week.

In this manner, the two largest dailies were brought into line. Publications that resisted were simply shut down, as was the case with al-Umma. Agents of the Preventive Security Service raided its office, confiscated documents and equipment and burned down its building. It hasn't published since.

Critics from human rights organizations were similarly dealt with. When Iyad a-Sarraj took over Palestinian Independent Commission for Citizens' Rights from Hanan Ashrawi, Arafat apologist and PA spokesperson, a-Sarraj tried to make it independent of the PA and told a European-sponsored conference that he had received no response to more than 400 complaints he had filed against the PA. He was jailed, but upon his release, he again criticized the PA. He was jailed three more times. On the last occasion, he was beaten up and charged with assaulting a policeman.

The silencing of Arafat's critics paralleled his establishment of an electronic media monopoly that became his most avid cheerleader.

The notion that a free and fair election can be held in a dictatorship is, of course, ludicrous. The question is not what happens on election day, but whether there is already in existence a free press, the right of assembly and an independent judiciary that permit free, informed voting to take place at all. Most important in "voters'" minds is what happens to them after the "election" and the Jimmy Carterish election observers have returned to their homes in the West. The idea that some benefit is to be derived from holding an election in Palestine (or indeed, in any Arab country) seems to have its origin in an observation made by former Soviet dissident and current Israeli cabinet minister, Nathan Sharansky, that never in the history of the world have democracies gone to war against one another. Therefore, by forcing an election down the throats of the Palestinians, you will create a democracy and, poof!, a miracle will take place and Israel and Palestine will be tautologically unable to fight each other. Do the same in other Arab populations, and you will have total peace in the Middle East.

> 'Silencing of Arafat's critics paralleled his establishment of an electronic media monopoly'

U.S. President George W. Bush appears to be using this reasoning in a desperate attempt to placate critics of his upcoming invasion of Iraq. More than one commentator has speculated that with Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein gone, a U.S.-imposed democracy in Iraq will set off a chain reaction that will cause all the other tyrants of the Middle East – for clarity's sake, every other Arab leader – to succumb to the forces of democracy, which in turn will establish regimes that will co-exist with their fellow democracy, Israel.

This is utter nonsense. I would have thought that the experience of 9/11, replete with Arabs dancing in the streets and handing out candies in celebration, would have by now conclusively demonstrated the futility of applying western models of conduct to people who do not share western culture.

Democracy has about as much chance of taking root in the Arab world in the near future as palm trees do of flourishing in the High Arctic. The reason is that the Arabs first have to enter the modern era before they can become democratic. Once they are able to occupy themselves with trying to get a second car or where to go for a winter vacation or how to find a competent person to maintain a backyard swimming pool, once they have discarded their collective tribal mindset, once they will not find the presence of a western democracy in their midst an affront to their sense of honour and pride that requires Israel's eradication, then they will be ready for democracy. The proposition that western practices and institutions should be accepted by non-western cultures for their own good is western arrogance – a repackaging of the discredited imperialist belief that the world's indigenous peoples needed to be converted to Christianity for their own good.

But even if a free and fair election could now be held in the West Bank and Gaza, which it can't, what would it achieve? Keep in mind that democracy does not make people good. When it works properly, it is a vehicle for the expression of the will of the majority. As such, it is neutral. A democratic nation of pedophiles would likely elect a pedophile as its leader. A democratic nation of idiots will elect an idiot as prime minister. And a democratic nation of terrorists and their supporters will elect a terrorist as its leader.

A December 2002 poll conducted by the Jerusalem Media & Communication Center found that 62.7 per cent of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza support terrorism against Israeli civilians. (The good news is that this is down from 84.6 per cent in the week after 9/11.) Guess what kind of government they would vote in if an election were held tomorrow? Will such an election serve to legitimize terrorism? Does the fact that Hitler became chancellor of Germany on Jan. 31, 1933 legally and democratically legitimize Nazism? Even the Nazis only got 37.1 per cent of the popular vote in the penultimate election held in the Weimar Republic (far more than any other party), and in the last free election, on Nov. 6, 1932, they fared even worse.

The oft-talked-about Palestinian street wants Israel destroyed. It dreams of returning to homes abandoned in 1948. It considers terrorist attacks against civilians a legitimate means to achieve that end. Other than in statesmen's dreams, no "election" is going to change that.

On eagle's wings

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

I was preparing to write about other current issues: maybe a piece on militant Islam, or the confusion of the recent Israeli elections, or the looming war with Iraq, or anti-Zionism on our university campuses.

But, as much as I tried to focus on any one of these, I could not. Instead, my mind kept wandering to that surreal image of the space shuttle Columbia hurtling to earth in a way that it shouldn't have and, in so doing, spilling its ever-so-precious cargo into a realm where survival would not be possible.

Just before the full impact of this awful tragedy began to sink in, there was a fleeting moment when I had actually forgotten, or maybe subconsciously refused to believe, that this was the very craft that carried the first-ever Israeli astronaut into outer space and that he, like the six others aboard that ill-fated vehicle, had now perished.

From what was known about him while he was alive and perhaps even more so from what we've learned about him since his death, there is no doubt that Ilan Ramon was a very special person, one of those rare human beings who set a standard of excellence and achieved greatness and recognition in just about everything he set out to do.

It was certainly not by accident that he was selected for the space program. With his impeccable record as both a fighter pilot and a scientist, he was likely without equal.

But when one reflects on Ramon's life, what comes through more forcefully and perhaps more importantly than what he did is what he was – and what he stood for. Both prior to the mission and during it, he was never heard to express even the slightest hint of equivocation about his Jewish roots and the immense pride he felt in his heritage. And at every possible opportunity, he would reaffirm his unwavering connectedness to his history and to his faith. The selection of keepsakes and symbols that he so carefully chose to take with him on the spacecraft reflected this in such a powerful and poignant way.

Israelis, and Jews around the world, could not have asked for a better ambassador, nor found ourselves a greater role model, than Ilan Ramon. For what beamed so clearly from the deepest recesses of outer space was his absolute devotion to the land that bore him and nurtured him and his profound wish for a united Jewish people that will forever prevail and prosper.

In these trying times, we need so badly to heed his message. So let us now hope that we're able to rise to the challenge of his legacy.

Lost in space

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

The other day, I was working with two colleagues at the Jerusalem headquarters of Israel Television preparing the weekend edition of IBA News. In mid-afternoon, I knew that my family, like millions of others Israelis, would be gathered around the TV watching the landing of Ilan Ramon, the country's first astronaut, aboard the space shuttle Columbia.

Unlike in the United States, where shuttle trips have become almost humdrum, Ramon and his mission were major news in Israel. Well before he embarked on his 16-day voyage into space in mid-January, he had already captured the hearts of the nation. His sense of humanity, modesty and courage had endeared him to all Israelis. While high above the planet, he remained as down-to-earth as always in his frequent conversations with Israel via a live televised hookup. The nation seemed to hang on his every word.

A festive anticipation gripped much of the country just ahead of Ramon's return. People were eager to see the former air force pilot and his six American crewmates make their triumphant touchdown. Because of its historic significance, Israel's three main TV networks planned extensive coverage of the event. One of our rivals had Ramon's father as a studio guest to watch the landing.

I was slated to read the news that evening. For a change, instead of leading with yet another grim tale of terrorist attacks or political turmoil, I looked forward to starting the show with an uplifting story about Israeli achievement and a successful end to a journey that had engrossed the nation for the previous two weeks.

Ten minutes after when Columbia was due to land, I phoned home. It was around 4:30 p.m. in Jerusalem. At that point, even though the fate of the astronauts was still unknown, all signs pointed to trouble.

My 13-year-old daughter, Shani, answered the phone. She sounded terribly upset. "Abba, they're all dead, aren't they?!" she screamed, almost in tears. Without waiting for an answer, she cried: "Ilan Ramon isn't coming back." She passed the phone to my wife, who was equally distraught.

In the newsroom, what was supposed to be a straightforward story now pulsated with unwanted drama. The first hint of a potential disaster came just after 4 p.m. in a one-line dispatch on the newswires. It said simply that Mission Control in Houston had lost contact with the shuttle as it made its descent.

As I read those words, I wanted to believe they did not mean what I feared they meant. Surely it was just a delay, nothing serious.

Hours earlier, when we planned the lineup for the evening newscast, Ramon/Columbia was the obvious choice to lead with. This was the climax of a space dream that began in 1995 when former U.S. president Bill Clinton announced that an Israeli would join a NASA team on a shuttle mission.

Not since John Glenn orbited the globe in 1962 or Neil Armstrong walked on the moon in 1969 has a country embraced one of its astronauts with the emotion that Israel showed for Ramon.

With an Israeli flag on his space suit for the world to see, and taking with him objects symbolizing Jewish and Israeli heritage, Ramon was far more than an astronaut to Israelis. He was a hero who embodied the hopes, dreams and pride of an entire nation. He was part of the family.

It didn't matter that the scientific experiments Ramon conducted aboard Columbia were esoteric and far removed from the daily lives of Israelis. All they cared about was that a local boy and son of a Holocaust survivor had made it to the big leagues. Through him, every Israeli had a stake in the Columbia, and in outer space itself.

Ramon's trip was a welcome distraction from the reality on the ground. It diverted attention from the seemingly endless terror campaign by Palestinians, an economy that's in the pits and getting worse, an election that offered little hope and an impending war with Iraq. He gave Israelis something to cheer about when the country needed it most.

Sadly, with Ramon's fiery demise, Israel took another bad hit. Yet again the nation finds itself overcome by shock, grief and tragic loss.

Today, a small part of each of us remains lost in space.

Ilan Ramon and the ties that bind

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The emotional roller-coaster that accompanied the triumphant launch and tragic death of Israeli astronaut Ilan Ramon was accompanied by an eerie reminder of events that happened more than 20 years ago.

On June 7, 1981, Ramon was the youngest member of the Israeli Air Force team that infiltrated the skies of Iraq to destroy Saddam Hussein's French-made Osiraq nuclear reactor. Former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin's decision to bomb the reactor came after months of failed diplomatic efforts, particularly in Paris and Washington, D.C., to bring a halt to the flow of this deadly technology.

Since both the United States and France at the time were supporting Iraq in its war against Iran, Israeli intelligence information about the need to take steps to stop Saddam from gaining nuclear weapons was ignored. When all other options had been rejected there was little choice, despite the considerable risk, but to send the air force to insure Israel's security and survival.

Ramon's team returned as heroes (at the time, their identities were not revealed to the public), and the surprise precision attack stopped the Iraqi nuclear program for many years.

But this bold act of Israeli chutzpah was also considered to be politically incorrect, and most of the world, including the United States, condemned the Israeli action as an illegal infringement on the national sovereignty of other nations (including Saudi Arabia, over whose airspace Ramon's team probably flew). Israel was even suspended for a short time from the International Atomic Energy Agency for attacking the facilities of a fellow member.

Ten years later, in 1991, Saddam and his weapons of mass destruction were again the targets of preventive military action. By then, at least the Americans, joined by some knowledgeable but quiet voices in Europe, recognized the importance of the Israeli action to put the Osiraq reactor out of business. If Ramon and the Israeli Air Force had been unsuccessful in their mission, the United States and the rest of the world might have been facing a Saddam armed with nuclear weapons.

Yet, in 1991, the U.S. government stopped short of ridding Iraq and the world of the brutality of Saddam's dictatorship, assuming – wrongly – that the Iraqi people would rise up and do the job themselves. The mistakes and weakness of the Clinton administration and the craven short-term self-interest of many other countries, including Canada and most nations in Europe, allowed the economic sanctions that had been placed on Iraq to force an end to Saddam's regime to unravel.

As a result, when Ramon was rocketed into orbit on the U.S. space shuttle last month, Saddam was still in business, and for the third time in two decades, Iraq was on the verge of acquiring nuclear weapons.

Israel is waiting to see whether the United States will indeed lead the international community in making sure that the threat posed by these and other forms of weapons of mass destruction are not available to Iraq for use in attacking, intimidating or coercing its neighbors.

But now, in contrast to both 1981 and the tension-filled days of 1991 – when the United States kept the Israeli government at arm's length – Washington and Jerusalem are working closely together. Ramon's inclusion as an astronaut for the mission of the doomed U.S. space shuttle was a tribute to, and a visible symbol of, this co-operation.

Almost alone among the free and democratic countries of the world, America recognizes that Israel shares with it the same threats to its way of life and national survival. (Lately, the leaders of Australia and some Canadians have also begun to understand that Israel is, first and foremost, the only democratic country in the Middle East.)

The death of the seven astronauts – Ramon and six Americans, including a mission specialist who was an immigrant from India – was a terrible blow, but in grief, the ties that bind Israel and America have become stronger.

These ties will be extremely important in the coming weeks, when the evil unleashed by Saddam is finally removed.

The Kirshner File

It's time to stop appeasing Saddam Hussein

Hans Blix, one of the chief United Nations weapons inspectors, put it best.

"Iraq appears not to have come to a genuine acceptance – not even today – of the disarmament which was demanded of it and which it needs to carry out to win the confidence of the world and live in peace."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Delivering a much-awaited report on Iraq's proscribed chemical and biological weapons programs, Blix conveyed this blunt message to the Security Council on Jan. 27, some two months after UN inspectors resumed monitoring operations in Iraq. With this candid assessment, Blix put Iraqi strongman Saddam Hussein squarely on notice that failure to fully honour UN Resolution 1441, adapted unanimously last November after two months of intense debate, would result in "serious consequences" – a U.S.-led invasion aimed at toppling his repressive Ba'athist regime.

Buoyed by Blix's speech, U.S. President George W. Bush warned Saddam that Iraq has "weeks, not months" to disarm, while Secretary of State Colin Powell declared that "time is running out." Driving home the point, Secretary of Defence Donald Rumsfeld said that all options, except the use of force, have almost been exhausted.

For Iraq, the endgame is at hand. Washington has run out of patience with its persistent dissemblance. Yet Baghdad clings to the claim that it possesses no such chemical, biological or nuclear weapons. Its words ring hollow.

If Iraq does not conclusively prove that it has disposed of its deadly arsenal as demanded by Resolution 1441, it will pay dearly for its record of deceit and prevarication. The United States, backed militarily by Britain and others, is poised to launch a preventive war to decapitate Saddam's regime.

Barring an astonishing volte face by Iraq, which no one should expect, a war now seems inevitable. "The strike is coming," President Hosni Mubarak of Egypt asserted last month. Tariq Aziz, Saddam's obsequious spokesman and deputy prime minister, said recently that only a miracle can avert war at this late stage. For once, I agree with Aziz.

It is extremely unlikely that Iraq will come clean. Since the close of the 1991 Gulf War, triggered by Iraq's occupation of Kuwait, Iraq has been dodging and weaving, playing a cynical cat-and-mouse game with the UN. Saddam has repeatedly pledged to disarm, but his promises have been worthless.

Mindful of ancient Iraqi glories, Saddam will not rest until he expands Iraq's influence throughout the Middle East and destroys Israel. These are his strategic objectives.

In 1980, he ordered the invasion of Iran. The war, the bloodiest in the annals of the region, lasted eight years, consuming a million lives. In 1990, his army occupied Kuwait. A year later, he fired dozens of Scud missiles at Israel, Kuwait and Saudi Arabia. Last month, in a characteristically defiant speech marking the 12th anniversary of the start of the Gulf War, he declared: "Long live Palestine, free and Arab, from the sea to the river."

Since Saddam cannot achieve his long-range political goals without non-conventional weapons of mass destruction, he has no intention of relinquishing them, now or in the future. This is the key to divining his intentions.

UN monitors left Iraq in 1998, frustrated by Saddam's trickery. They had destroyed part of his stockpile, but knew they had some way to go before Iraq was completely disarmed and defanged and no longer in a position to threaten its neighbours.

With the departure of the inspectors, Saddam was better able to conceal his panoply of prohibited weapons. When the UN returned to Iraq, a country the size of California, they had in their pockets a checklist of about 1,000 sites they planned to visit. Being familiar with their itinerary, Iraq sanitized the sites and moved around equipment – which is why the whole inspection system is a sham and, really, a waste of everyone's time.

To no one's surprise, the UN has found no "smoking gun" during its most recent round of inspections. Saddam is aggressive, but he is not crazy. The onus is on Iraq to own up. The UN's role is to verify Iraq's compliance. The Bush administration is right. Iraq is guilty until proved innocent.

From examples set by South Africa and Ukraine, we will know when Iraq is truly and sincerely complying with its obligations. South Africa, after the era of apartheid, voluntarily dismantled its covert nuclear weapons program and submitted to rigorous verification by the International Atomic Energy Agency. Ukraine, after the fall of the Soviet Union, voluntarily discarded its nuclear apparatus, long-range ballistic missiles and heavy bombers.

Iraq, however, has not been forthcoming. In fact, as Washington charges, Saddam is committed to maintaining his arsenal. Last December, in keeping with the provisions of Resolution 1441, Iraq filed a 12,200 page declaration to the UN about its weapons programs. It was a farce, full of old and dated data and replete with glaring omissions.

To quote Condoleezza Rice, Bush's national security advisor, Iraq's report was designed to "cloud and confuse" the issue. By its actions, Iraq "is proving not that it is a nation bent on disarmament, but that it is a nation with something to hide," she wrote.

On the the most basic level, Iraq is prevaricating. Quite apart from a fundamental reluctance to lead inspectors to "smoking guns," Iraq is not allowing its cadre of scientists to be interviewed, in private or abroad,though Iraq permitted a biologist to be interviewed last week. Saddam, rightly, fears they will talk. Iraq's scientists are painfully aware that, in a harsh Stalinist state like Iraq, they and their families will be murdered if they reveal incriminating information.

In addition, Saddam is withholding permission for American U-2 reconnaissance planes to survey Iraq.

Under these circumstances, the hapless inspectors will find nothing of value, even if given months or years to complete their mission.

Iraq's flagrant violation of Resolution 1441 was methodically documented by Blix last month. Iraq has probably developed weapons with the nerve agent VX, one of the deadliest ever devised. Iraq has failed to account for 6,500 chemical bombs. Iraq provided no convincing evidence it had destroyed 8,500 litres of anthrax. Iraq is building two missile systems that violate UN restrictions limiting missiles to a range of 150 kilometres. The 12 empty chemical warheads discovered by the UN on Jan. 12 could be "the tip of a submerged iceberg."

Iraq's nuclear program may or may not still exist. Mohamed ElBaradei, the UN's inspector for atomic weapons, told the Security Council that his team had found no evidence of an attempt by Iraq to revive its nuclear capabilities, but Powell disagrees with his appraisal. (Iraq would have become a nuclear power by the mid or late 1980s had the Israeli Air Force not bombed its nuclear reactor in June 1981.)

The case against Iraq, which is compelling despite naysayers, was reinforced by Powell on Feb. 5. At the Security Council, he delivered an open-and-shut case demonstrating Iraqi evasion and deception. Powell presented damning satellite photographs and communications interceptions to prove that Iraq is continuing to play hide and seek with the UN. Again, there was no "smoking gun." But the weight of the evidence, plus Iraq's gamesmanship, strongly suggests that Iraq is in material breach of Resolution 1441, which he called Iraq's "last chance" to comply.

On Feb. 14, Blix and ElBaradei are scheduled to submit their next report, and if the past is any guide, we will be back to square one. Saddam will be chided for his lack of co-operation, and the argument will be made that additional time is required to disarm Iraq.

Washington, having adopted a pre-emption doctrine as a cardinal principle of its foreign policy, has no intention of being strung along any further. With good reason, the Bush administration rejects the notion that Iraq can be persuaded to meekly give up its weapons of mass destruction – as countries such as France and Germany contend – and scoffs at the idea that its war against international terrorism will be compromised if it attacks Iraq.

It is clear that containment is a bankrupt policy and that war, thanks to Iraq's recalcitrance, is the only remaining option left on the table. No sane person prefers war to peace, but Saddam has seen to it that there is no other alternative. The world must stop appeasing Saddam Hussein.

What gives at the UN?

We live in a topsy-turvy universe, but this craziness has been taken to new, infinitely absurd levels. Libya, which has little respect for the lives of its citizens, has been elected chair of the UN's Commission on Human Rights. Iraq, which is hoarding weapons of mass destruction, is slated to be the next chair of the UN's disarmament conference. Has the UN gone mad? Judge for yourself.

Adopt a Family

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto בתי חינוך העזרה הכאחדים בטורונטו

The importance of Tzedaka (charity) is a prominent part of our education. This year, we "adopted" two Israeli families who are victims of terror attacks. The daughter of one family was killed as she returned to her army base, leaving parents and four siblings. The father of the other family was killed on his way home from work, leaving a wife and six children. We provide vital financial support through school-wide fundraising. Students establish personal contact with letters, packages and hand-made crafts, providing crucial emotional support. Everyone benefits: Tzedaka becomes our children's way of life, and we ease the burden of victims of terror.

NCJW launches 20th Passover food drive

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When 10-year-old Daniel Hochman was asked to help out at last year's Passover food drive run by National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section, he thought he was in for a long, boring day.

After he delivered boxes to a few houses, however, he realized he was doing an important job.

Speaking at the recent launch of this year's drive, Daniel said that one couple "cried tears of joy when I brought the food. I know now how [important] it is to help people."

The drive, now in its 20th year, is sponsored by Mazon Canada and Canadian Jewish Congress. It assists about 10,000 recipients by supplying more than 3,000 boxes containing many of the essentials needed for the week of Passover, including juice, wine, chicken and Passover non-perishables, as well as candles and a Haggadah.

Referrals are received through Jewish Family & Child Services, Jewish Immigrant Aid Services, UJA Board of Jewish Education, Circle of Care, the Reena Foundation, Ve'ahavta – Canadian Jewish Human and Relief Committee, and from rabbis in the GTA.

While the project was originally launched to help immigrants, present referrals include those on a fixed income or without means.

The organization also delivers boxes to shelters, and provides food for a seder run by Ve'ahavta for the homeless, the hungry, and those who have nowhere to go.

Daniel Hochman

At the launch, Terry Winston, executive director, NCJW Toronto, said that as well as providing recipients with food, they want to give them the means to celebrate Passover.

For the first time this year, she said, they are enclosing an outreach package in the box so recipients will have access to community agencies.

Organizers are working towards the day when the drive will not be necessary, she said, "but unfortunately it is filling a need in the community."

Rachel Walters, food drive co-ordinator, said she is turning to synagogues and schools to promote the drive.

"Traditionally, day and supplementary school students have assisted by donating food for the drive and helping with the packing process, but we would like to invite the schools to play a larger role by participating in our Give the Gift of Passover program," she said.

> 'The moral importance of a safety net cannot be [over-emphasized]'

This year, day and supplementary school students will be encouraged to work with their peers to develop a fund-raising project related to the Passover theme.

"While the amount of money raised will become a tangible goal, the major objective of this program should be the process itself.

"Creativity, leadership, co-operation and project management are just a few of the skills that will be stimulated while carrying out this endeavour," said Walters.

Art Eggleton, MP for York Centre said that the true character of a community can be seen through the lens of how it takes care of its needy.

"The moral importance of a safety net cannot be [over-emphasized.]"

A comprehensive approach to helping the needy must come from all levels of government, but volunteer organizations are needed to fill in the gaps, he said.

Some people in the community spend more than 60 per cent of their income on rent, and some are forced to choose between food and rent, he said. "The Passover food drive [helps these people.] It falls to the community to make a difference for the poor among us," Eggleton said.

Ester Timbo, who has received Passover food boxes in the past, said that it has made her feel lucky to be part of the community.

"It has made it easier to pass the tradition of Passover down to my children. When the box was delivered to my door I thanked God for having people who care for us. My children now know that they live in a caring community."

The underlying cause of anti-war fervour

By HENRY SREBRNIK

Guest Voice

Late last month, I heard a commentator on an American news program suggest that anti-American feeling in Europe is worse now than it was even during the Vietnam War – and he was reporting from the World Economic Forum of multimillionaires in Davos, Switzerland!

How can this be? After all, we're talking about a potential war against Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein who, even if not directly implicated in Islamist terrorism, is a brutal murderer running a police state that has killed tens of thousands of its own citizens and launched invasions against two bordering states, Iran and Kuwait, as well as attacked Israel with missiles.

Many anti-war protestors, in particular those on the political left, would in other instances be the first to argue that the "world community" has the right to step in and override a nation's sovereignty when it is brutalizing its own citizens or neighbours. My guess is that most of them supported the incursions into Bosnia, Kosovo, East Timor and Rwanda, among other recent examples. Usually, for such people, the protection of human rights trumps realpolitik: they are not Kissingerian "realists" or isolationists, like those on the right.

So why is the attempt to get rid of Saddam being met with much more resistance among the left than did the U.S.-led attack on former Yugoslavian president Slobodan Milosevic, who was a saint by comparison? Remember, the war in Kosovo did not receive UN authorization, either. Observing the reaction of the anti-war movement to these two cases, I think, gives the game away. I would suggest that the underlying cause (two can play the "root causes" game) of a lot of today's anti-war fervour stems from, if not anti-Semitism pure and simple, then at least an extremely deep and toxic animosity towards Israel. This, of course, was not a factor in the debate over Kosovo.

'Toxic animosity towards Israel'

In effect, the United States is seen in the current crisis by anti-war protesters as a proxy for Israel, Saddam a proxy for the Palestinians. In their view, this will be "[Israeli Prime Minister Ariel] Sharon's war," part of his criminal plan to crush the Arab world and dominate the Middle East. And he has tricked and seduced the White House – itself full of Jewish neoconservative hawks egging U.S. President George W. Bush on towards war – into going along with it.

Many of the people in the anti-war movement are also "Third Worldist" anti-globalists, and for them "American imperialism" is the enemy, with Israel considered a stalking horse for Washington. For them, it is America and Israel that constitute an "axis of evil" and two-headed monster. This is why a lot of them have or will become, willy-nilly, anti-Semites, not in the classical pre-1945 sense, where hatred of Jews was often based on religion, but rather because they will see the Jewish community, who are almost uniformly supporters of Israel, as part – indeed in the forefront – of the enemy camp, and thus opposed to the "liberation" of the peoples being crushed under the American heel.

Welcome to the international Jewish conspiracy, 2003 edition.

Don't blame the bully's victim

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

"My child is being bullied and I don't know what to do."

It's extremely disturbing to report that I have heard this lament more than once from parents with children in Jewish schools. The complaints range from verbal badgering to physical abuse. The issue is all the more painful given the rather blasé attitude to this account in some educational quarters.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

Some – but certainly not all – parents, teachers and administrators, especially when it comes to younger males engaged in such activity, will pass it off as a "boys will be boys" situation. Children on the wrong end of this harassment are counselled not to be so sensitive.

Since when did the word "sensitive" develop such a negative connotation? The etymology of the word suggests the reverse of this patronizing dismissal, deriving from the Latin "sentire," meaning "to feel." Apparently, children who have a highly developed sense of feeling are bad news for our school system. Would we prefer them to be wooden automatons or simply immune to compassion or even sensation? Down that road lies a maladjusted adult, or worse.

But all of this misses the point entirely. It is not "sensitivity" that leads kids to reject being mauled by some insecure, and hence, bullying child. It is an acute awareness of their right to freedom from teasing and torment. In other words, it's a matter of simple justice and human rights.

Playground tyranny is the source of tears, bad dreams, diminished academic performance and deep, visceral unhappiness. How can this possibly be ignored?

'Simple justice and human rights'

Quite easily, actually. It comes down to the vaunted self-image that some parents and schools wish to maintain of themselves, even in the face of their child/student tormenting others. On a deep, often unacknowledged level, they don't want to consider how their child's clearly unethical and troubling behaviour reflects on their parenting or teaching. It is easier to blame the victim as overly touchy or too thin-skinned, as if a child, especially in grade school, should have to worry about developing an armour-plated response to the world.

In their book, Bullyeide: Death at Playtime, Neil Marr and Tim Field present a poignant and utterly devastating picture of the dark end of this spectrum, exploring child suicide that is caused by bullying. The predictable rejoinder to the suicide scenario – that it's overly alarmist and very rare – again evades the core of the issue.

If one child becomes depressed, if one boy or girl does not want to get out of bed on school mornings because of what awaits them, if one student approaches the schoolyard with trepidation and fright, it's one child too many.

We know this problem exists. It is incumbent on parents to be proactive in taking up their child's cause and tenaciously pursuing the root of the bullying, even if it means an uncomfortable series of phone calls to another parent or a school principal.

And to those who laugh off the matter, I have a question. How would you feel if your child woke up in the middle of the night, shaking with anxiety and panic at the spectre of the coming day?

How would you feel if it was you?

Remembering Ilan Ramon

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"I rarely cry, but am obliged to say I did this time. God Bless Ilan Ramon." Essie Karting.

"Ilan Ramon, a hero, as were his parents. An inspiration to many others. We are proud of you and Israel." Homer Hulette.

"Your son is a hero. We are so, so sorry he is gone." Itzik Yosefson.

Those are just three of the hundreds of sympathy notes people have sent to Aish Hatorah's Web site. Since Col. Ilan Ramon died along with six crewmates aboard the space shuttle Columbia, the Internet has become a focal point for people searching for information about this remarkable man, and it has become a place where they can share their own grief over his death.

At the Aish site, Dina Coopersmith explains why Ramon's death has had such a profound effect on Israelis. "After 16 days of almost constant news coverage about Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, we all felt we knew him. He was family. He represented us all – our country, our people, our past and our future. He was our hero at a time when we sorely needed one… How could he be gone? How could all our hopes and dreams disintegrate into the thin layer of atmosphere that protects the earth?"

If you would like to share your feelings, visit the Aish Hatorah site. If you prefer to share your thoughts with Ramon's wife Rona and her family, you can e-mail ilan family@mail.idf.il.

I have also visited some other discussion areas, such as the Israeli USENET newsgroups, to see what people are saying about Ramon and the shuttle disaster. Unfortunately, many have become repositories for anti-Semites spoiling for a fight. Save your time.

Many news outlets such as CNN [http://www.cnn.com/SPECIALS/ 2003/shuttle] and the New York Times [http://www.nytimes.com/national/nationalspecial] have set up large Internet sections devoted to the Columbia disaster. To see how Ramon's death is being covered back home, I recommend the excellent English language sites of Ha'aretz [http://makeashorter link.com/?F2F455553] and the Jerusalem Post [http://info.jpost.com/C003/Supplements/Astronaut/].

The Post has interviews with Ramon, features about his military career (including his role in the 1981 bombing of an Iraqi nuclear reactor), a look at how he spent Shabbat in space and world reaction to his death. One article on the Ha'aretz site tells how Ramon's former high school classmates returned to a memorial service at their school in Be'er Sheva. One recalled Ramon as the "antithesis of the typical pilot and therein was his greatness. He was not the self-confident character, arrogant. He was precisely the opposite."

Two other extensive Israeli sites are run by the Israel Defence Forces [http://www.idf.il/newsite/english/ramon.stm] and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, where you can see a postage stamp that was issued to mark Ramon's historic voyage. [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/ go.asp?MFAH0mx40]

As you probably know, Ramon, a son and grandson of Holocaust survivors, wanted to commemorate the Shoah during his space flight. He contacted the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial in Jerusalem and requested a Holocaust-related item to take with him. Yad Vashem chose the drawing Moon Landscape, made by Petr Ginz, a 14-year-old Jewish boy, during his incarceration in the Theresienstadt ghetto. Yad Vashem's Web site has background about the art Ramon took into space and a note of condolence about the late astronaut. [http://www.yadvashem.org.il/about_yad/press_room/temp_index_press_room_ramon.html]

NASA maintains several sites with updates about the disaster and the investigation. [http://www.nasa.gov/columbia/] along with its official biography of Ramon. [http://www.jsc.nasa.gov/Bios/PS/ramon.html]. But the most moving of NASA's sites lets you to watch videos of Ramon and the Columbia crew in space. In one, Ramon chats with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. When he speaks about the magnificent view from the shuttle, his infectious smile tells you all you need to know about how proud he was of what he was doing. [http://spaceflight.nasa.gov/gallery/video/shuttle/sts-107/html/fd6.html]

May Ramon's family be comforted among the mourners of Zion and Jerusalem.

What Shall I Do With This People? Jews and the Fractious Politics of Judaism*, By Milton Viorst, The Free Press, 2002, $39.50

Yigal Amir, who murdered Yitzhak Rabin in 1995, never expressed remorse. He once told investigators, "According to Jewish law, the minute a Jew gives over his land and people to the enemy he must be killed… I don't have a problem with it." Amir remained convinced that in killing Rabin he was doing God's work.

This terrible act became the basis for this book, which examines how religious leaders through the centuries have shaped Judaism to serve their own political ends – often with disastrous consequences.

The author, a widely esteemed journalist who covered the Middle East for three decades as a correspondent for the New Yorker, is perplexed and dismayed by the fanaticism he finds among Israeli religious and political groups.

How, he wonders, could the rabbi who officiated at the funeral of Baruch Goldstein, who murdered 29 Arabs in Hebron in 1994, refer to him as "A martyr who joins the victims of the Nazi Holocaust."

Religious Zionists ardently defend the West Bank settlements they sponsored after 1967, despite the opposition of the international community and much of the Jewish world. Intransigence on both sides has led to bitter and protracted controversy, with no end in sight.

Another source of contention are the more than 200,000 students now enrolled in state-funded yeshivot who are exempt from military service, an increase of 30 per cent over five years. Most of these haredi men, who are studying Torah, never learn how to earn a living. Fewer than half enter the workforce, depending for a living on the state, as well as private charities, parents and their wives. Haredim see the system of exemptions as crucial to preserving the character of their community.

Sensitive to the rising chorus of secular objections, the Israeli government in 1999 proposed a compromise by which students might voluntarily leave the yeshiva to earn a living in return for serving a symbolically short army tour. The haredi leadership refused the change, claiming it violated God's will.

On another front, the rift between Ashkenazim and Sephardim goes back to the early days of Sephardi immigration to Israel, when Sephardim were confined in fetid refugee camps, then squeezed into urban slums or shipped off to remote development towns. They didn't forget.

Unhappily, Israel's political system perpetuates antagonism and divisiveness. The electoral process awards political parties a seat for every 1.5 per cent of the total vote they receive in Knesset elections.

Haredim make no pretense that civic responsibility is involved in their balloting. "When they tell us to vote," a Haredi is quoted as saying about his rabbis, "it is a mitzvah and not an option." Block voting explains much about how the haredim win victories over the secular majority. With the Knesset's two party blocs in close balance, haredi voters tip the balance, giving them power grossly disproportionate to their numbers.

Israel faces fateful questions. Will religious extremism eventually destroy the state? Do the traits summarized by the term "stiff-necked" sap the capacity of Jews to treat one another with respect? Is internal war just as dangerous as war with external enemies? Are present disputes tearing apart the fabric of a 4,000-year-old civilization?

Viorst concludes his book with these words of warning: "After two thousand years of strenuous survival in exile, it would be a grim irony if homecoming is remembered by history not as the seed of the Jews' redemption but of their self-destruction." This frightening book makes one weep.

Life in Israel: student-to-student talk

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Israeli university students Hadas Greenglass and Yuval Nemlich visited high schools and university campuses in Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver last week to put a human face on the situation in Israel.

"I'm not going to tell you I'm not afraid to sit in a coffee shop or take a bus," Greenglass, 22, told a Grade 10 Talmud class at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Richmond Hill campus. "I'm always cautious, always looking to see who's sitting next to me, and I sort of plan my next step according to [what I hear on the news]. But we do live."

Nemlich, a 24-year-old law student at Bar-Ilan University, said he sees his life as a normal one. "We share the same dreams and hopes [as you]. Terror has affected our lives [in that] we appreciate life. We know what we can lose. But it didn't change my social life. We're just more careful. People coming to Israel don't get the sense of a scary and unsafe place."

'We're just more careful'

The Israelis encouraged the Canadian teens to visit Israel. Whether or not to live in Israel is a personal decision, said Greenglass, "but I think each Jew should at least come and visit Israel and see the real situation, see that it's not only CNN. After being in Israel, you feel closer."

"We need you to come as tourists. We need your support," said Nemlich frankly. "We need you to talk to your non-Jewish friends and explain the situation, and balance the ways in which Israel is described abroad."

The situation is very complex, said Greenglass, noting that people may infer from media reports that the Israelis are to blame for killing innocent Palestinians. "Once there's a terrorist attack, the government wants to protect Israelis," Greenglass explained. "They go in [to Palestinian areas] to find those terrorists, as the Americans went into Afghanistan to find Al Qaeda."

She believes that the average Palestinian wants peace as much as Israelis do. "The problem is how to eliminate these extreme movements and see where the real people are."

As a student at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Greenglass was hit hard by the bombing last July 31 of the Mount Scopus campus' Frank Sinatra cafeteria, a place she spent much time in. A close friend's girlfriend, who was injured in the bombing, is still in hospital, unable to walk, she said.

"For me, Hebrew University was a symbol of peace and co-existence," Greenglass said. "It has both Arabs and Jews. [The bombing] broke my dreams, but I can't tell you life doesn't go on. Life does go on."

The visit by Greenglass and Nemlich shows that although there's turmoil in Israel, there's also hope for the future, said Jesse Guberman, director of communications and public affairs of the Israeli consulate in Toronto, which brought in the two students. "We're bringing the reality closer to home."

Greenglass, who also spoke at the University of Western Ontario to a class of Jewish and non-Jewish students in a course called Understanding Israel, told The CJN that a Palestinian student thanked her after the class. "I was glad I could help, and say what I thought as a person."

That session was particularly challenging for her, she said, because she strived to be as diplomatic as possible and yet still say what she believed.

Jewish students in particular should know the facts about Israel, said Greenglass. "What happens in Israel affects the Jewish Diaspora. If the international media see Israel as murderers, Israelis and Jews who live in [other] countries will be treated badly. Jews will always be part of Israel, no matter where they are."

A second meeting a few months later will prove the litmus test whether there is sufficient interest to go ahead with the project. At that time, he'll ask for $500 deposits to be held in escrow, and if at least 25 people are interested, the project will go ahead.

If it's successful, Kaplan said, investors will be participating in a Zionist dream. "The message in Israel will be that there are Canadians looking to Israel for investment, that we're not sitting around doing nothing and the best place to do it is in Israel."

CORRECTION

In the article, "Israeli pianist draws standing ovation in downtown concert" (CJN, Feb. 6), the location of the concert was incorrect. It actually took place at the new Sandra Ainsley Gallery at 55 Mill St., the old Gooderham & Worts distillery building. The CJN regrets the error.

University community celebrates Israel

By SHIRA ZELIGER
Special to The CJN

Nearly 200 students from York University, the University of Toronto (U of T) and Ryerson University gathered last week to celebrate at the Grand Finale of Israelfest '03, a two-week-long festival of Israeli culture held at campuses across Toronto.

The festival, sponsored by Hillel of Greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto), featured an Israeli mall, speakers, an interactive election program and a variety of exhibits, social action projects and movies.

Events at the Toronto campuses included free Israeli-style breakfasts, a Shabbat dinner, interactive advocacy workshops, exhibits on Israeli art and photography, a showcase of Israeli books and music, and sales and hand-outs of promotional items and Israeli products.

"The opportunity to portray a side of Israel that is rarely seen in the media and the public domain was our primary goal," said Michael Ferman, 19, both the city-wide and York chair of Israelfest '03.

"The festival reminded us that Israel is not about the intifadah or terrorism," added Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder, 20, a second-year Jewish education student at York. "Rather, it is a country with a strong culture and fascinating past, present and promising future."

Among the festival's highlights were two video conferences from Jerusalem with a panel of Israeli educators, journalists and academics, and the participation of the organization Israel at Heart, which sends groups of young Israelis to North American campuses to share their experiences of daily life in their country. Under the current tense conditions on campus, the Toronto students listened as the Israelis told their stories.

לא, גרמניה לא השתנתה! והיטיב לצטט גריין את המצב: " בכל גרמני מתחבא נאצי שמחכה להזדמנות לצאת לאור". אבל שיישאר ביניכם.

דיויד ברוזה- הכל או לא כלום

"בקרון האחרון.....
.....ערים חולפות בחושך מה מנצנץ בחוץ
אולי זו פילדלפיה אולי זה הקיבוץ...

עמוק בתוך הלילה, מריח את הים
מריח את העיר, את ערך החם,
שני לילות מחיפה, רק בתוך חלום
רואה שם את פני בנוף של החלון."

Professor's e-mail raises concerns of intimidation

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Trent University student Sara Berniker was astounded when she returned to school after winter vacation to find an e-mail titled "Jew-baiting" waiting for her in her inbox.

The message was sent to the Trent Jewish Students Association (TJSA) list by Prof. Michael Neumann, a Jewish philosophy professor at the university.

Neumann was responding to another e-mail sent to the TJSA students the day before by B'nai Brith Canada's national campus co-ordinator, Arieh Rosenblum, about the organization's efforts to highlight possible anti-Israel and anti-Semitic writings and activities on campuses and to respond to them.

In his message, Rosenblum expressed concern about an article by Neumann that was, in Rosenblum's opinion, "anti-Israel and anti-Semitic" in its "premises, tone and intent," and asked the students if the professor expressed similar views in his classes.

The article Rosenblum was referring to is called "What is Anti-Semitism?" and was published in the June 4, 2002 edition of Counterpunch, a left-wing magazine.

Neumann responded to Rosenblum's e-mail, which was forwarded to him, with the comment, "It is people like you who endanger and corrupt the Jewish people." He advised the students to stop "skulking about" and "read what I have written."

So Berniker read the article.

In it, Neumann argues that anti-Semitism and anti-Semitic acts are given too much attention and that they are "particularly unimportant to the Israel-Palestine conflict."

He then writes, "We should almost never take anti-Semitism seriously, and maybe we should have some fun with it."

Instead, Neumann says, the focus should be on "Zionist atrocities" and "Israel's race war" and then suggests that Jews around the world who do not criticize Israel are complicit in its "crimes."

Neumann is a regular contributor to Counterpunch and on his web page, he lists 10 articles he has written on the "Israel-Palestine" debate, including an article called "Israel and Indians" which argues that Palestinian terrorism against "soft targets" is legitimate "to prevent the destruction of their society."

Berniker, who had just returned from a Birthright Israel trip, was outraged by Neumann's words, which she called "disturbing."

His articles are "sneaky," she told The CJN, adding that she was angry that Neumann had "guilted" her into reading them.

"He also accuses us of not being well-versed enough to really debate all the issues," she said.

In the meantime, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has issued a complaint to Trent University president Bonnie Patterson. In the letter, CJC says that Neumann's claims – such as that "Israel hopes to create a land entirely empty of gentiles, an Arabia desert in which Jewish children can laugh and play throughout a wasteland called peace" and "Israel's purpose is not defence or public order but the extinction of a people" – are made "without a shred of supporting evidence."

Patterson has not responded to calls from The CJN.

Bernie Farber, executive director, CJC, Ontario region, said it is "inappropriate for a person in [Neumann's] position to respond [to Rosenberg's forwarded e-mail] this way."

He added, "Imagine how a Jewish or Israeli student at Trent University would feel today with a professor who writes articles that suggest that all Jews who do not condemn Israel are complicit in murder."

Farber said it is interesting that Neumann's extreme leftist opinions about the definition of anti-Semitism are similar to the views of the extreme right.

In an e-mail interview with The CJN, Neumann said he responded to Rosenberg's forwarded e-mail with the statement about corruption because he "views Jews who support Israel and conspire against those who dissent as corrupting, not simply Israeli culture, but Jewish culture."

But, he acknowledged that although he was upset by Rosenberg's forwarded e-mail, at least some of the recipients of his response did not deserve such a tirade.

Neumann also said he never expresses his views on campus because "he doesn't feel comfortable presenting any controversal opinions from... a position of authority over my audience."

He added that he has Jewish students in his classes, some of whom are aware of his views.

"Only one of them has discussed those views with me, and he agrees with most of what I say."

But Berniker, who is an English and cultural studies major, said she is relieved she doesn't have to take a class of Neumann's.

"After this angry exchange of e-mails, I wouldn't feel comfortable in his classroom even if his opinions don't spill into his lectures," she said.

Prof. Derek Penslar, the director of University of Toronto's Jewish studies program, said Neumann's views are not new. His articles, he said, are part of a far-left, fringe discourse, but "the Internet has made these views more accessible."

Technology has increased the availability of these kinds of views, Penslar said, and now the question is, "How do we deal with it?"

When asked about possible responses the university could take, Penslar said, "There are situations when university administrators have to censure academics" to ensure that all students feel comfortable on campus.

"Israelfest brought me much closer to the Jewish community on campus and around the city," said Noam Guberman, 24, an information-technology major at Ryerson and an event co-ordinator of that campus's IsraelFest.

The festival also attracted many students to off-campus events, such as an Israel advocacy day featuring David Olesker, the director of the Jerusalem Center for Communications and Technology, and a dinner and discussion about Israel advocacy on campus with Daniel Pipes, the Philadelphia-based academic and director of the Middle East Forum. Pipes' talk at York on Barriers to Peace, which went on despite attempts by some students and faculty to ban the event, was also part of the festival.

The final day of Israelfest at York featured the Jewish Link, a community-wide event with information about Israel experience programs, summer opportunities, volunteer and internship and social and learning programs.

Many students also attended exhibits at Hamilton's McMaster University and London's University of Western Ontario (UWO), who held an Israel Day in conjunction with the festivities in Toronto.

"Israel Day was a tremendous success," said Ilan Nachim, 22, the Israel opportunities chair of the Jewish Student's Union at UWO. "It brought out the true Zionist spirit, something that is not always visible on campus."

Hyla Korn, the orientation, outreach and engagement co-ordinator for U of T's Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, said, "Seeing the mixture of hundreds of students from all backgrounds expressing an interest in Israel was a truly unique and wonderful sensation."

Korn, 20, said campus visits by groups such as an Israeli drummer's circle were "upbeat and exciting."

Both Jewish and non-Jewish students said they were surprised to see that Israel was still a beautiful country after so many wars and so much terrorism.

"It was an eye-opening experience to learn about all aspects of Israel beyond the newspaper headlines," said Vipushitha Siripathy, a first-year student at York University's Schulich School of Business.

Shira Zeliger is a first-year religious studies major at York University and a member of the Jewish Student Federation's Israeli affairs committee.

Warm kugel evokes memories of Grandpa

By LISA J. SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

Food, Scrumptious Foods

My father held the world in his laugh. When you heard it, you understood how one man collected paintings of orange clowns, statues of sagging hobos, mugs with sinister faces and photographs of lion cubs in delicate embrace. Every note was in his laugh.

When my daughter was a baby and we lived close to him, we often met at a neighbourhood deli on Sunday mornings. He was always waiting there, still prompt from his 45 years as a businessman.

But when we shuffled in, me carrying his curly-headed granddaughter in my arms and all her stuff slung over two shoulders, and she pointed her chubby noodle finger at his table and yelled "Kugel," he burst into laughter, and my little girl joined in.

He knew she would eat every bite of the enormous rectangle of warmed kugel on her plate, and she knew exactly what she wanted every time we pushed through those familiar doors toward Grandpa.

One of the beauties of kugel is that the raisins, the noodles and even the lumpy cheese can be picked up with tiny fingers. Another of the beauties of kugel is that even the cheese, the softened raisins and the cooked noodles can be chewed by old teeth and tired gums.

I made a gigantic five-cheese kugel, along with potato latkes, for my daughter's first Chanukah. I made the same kugel for my friends to cheer them up.

But the most memorable kugel I ever ate was two days after my father died.

Betty Goodfriend, a dear family friend, delivered an enormous glass platter full as part of a Friday night meal. Her kugel had no cheese, no raisins and no milk. But it was soft and sweet and gentle going down. It lightly filled a space when I had no hunger for food. And somehow, as I ate it, I felt soothed.

Apparently, my brothers and sisters, my mother, my daughter and her cousins also found comfort in Mrs. Goodfriend's kugel, because the dish was empty before the meal ended. And with puffy eyes and swollen hearts, we talked about the delicious kugel, tried to decide what was in it, understand how to make it.

All I know is that when I chewed my last warm bite, and felt my tears begin again, I heard my father's laugh.

LAUGHING KUGEL

Betty Goodfriend is a self-described old-world cook. To me, this means that she cooks with her heart, not measuring spoons, and with available ingredients, rather then worrying about what's missing. The kugel she made for us during those special days didn't have raisins, but it did have nuts, crushed pineapple (instead of rings), and, as I recall, thin noodles. But no matter, her recipes are a good place to start and then you can make them your own. And, as she says, kugel freezes beautifully.

Topping: (optional)
1 cup corn flakes cereal
1 tbsp. brown sugar
1 tsp. cinnamon
chopped walnuts or pecans margarine to dot on top (if desired)

Kugel
6-8 tbsp. margarine
1 can pineapple, slices or chunks
2/3 cup dark brown sugar
4 large eggs
1/3 cup Sabra liqueur
1/2 cup pineapple juice (from can)
1 lb wide egg noodles
1/4 cup white sugar
1/3 cup vegetable oil, plus 2 tbsp.
1/4 cup raisins
1 tsp. cinnamon (to taste)

For kugel, melt margarine and pour into 9x13 inch glass pan. Make sure all sides are greased. Sprinkle brown sugar evenly over bottom. Arrange pineapple slices in a layer.

Preheat oven to 350. Boil noodles until al dente (not too soft). Drain and rinse in cold water. Put raisins in small bowl and pour hot water over to plump. Drain.

In large bowl, whisk eggs, sugar, oil, pineapple juice and liqueur together.

Add cinnamon. With a wooden spoon, mix noodles and raisins into egg mixture. (At this point, Mrs. Goodfriend says, taste for salt, and add if needed). Pour noodle mixture over pineapples in baking pan.

Topping:
Crush cornflakes, sugar, cinnamon, and nuts together and sprinkle over noodles. (Dot with extra margarine if desired)

Bake for one hour. Test at 45 minutes to see if bottom is dark. If so, move pan to higher rack in oven and bake 15 minutes longer.

Variation: Arrange red cherries, chopped walnuts or pecans on bottom layer of pineapple. Allow kugel to cool 10 minutes and then (using oven mitts) flip onto slightly larger serving platter for a beautiful upside down kugel.

Wine tasting evening planned

Temple Sinai and the Israeli Economic Mission are planning a wine tasting evening on March 4 at the temple.

Participants will learn about Israel's wine industry, have the opportunity to taste wines, and choose from a wide variety of kosher for Passover wines.

Wine distributors including Mazel Wines, Lorac Wine and Food, and Grafstein Wines will present a selection of 20 red and white wines, such as Riesling, Sauvignon Blanc, Merlot, Chardonnay and Cabernet Sauvignon, in all price ranges.

Featured at the wine tasting will be Benjamin Noy, consul trade commissioner for Israel, and Gabriel Regev, economic adviser and deputy trade commissioner, who will speak about Israel's wine industry.

Proceeds from the sale will aid Congregation Vozma in Modiin, Israel, and Israeli victims of terror.

Media must focus on dictatorships, not democracies

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

With war against Iraq increasingly likely, the media continues to apply a double standard to Israel. This issue has been examined before in this column but bears re-visiting. Two recent examples illustrate the problem.

On CBC Newsworld's Counterspin (Jan. 28), Alistair Millar of the Sanctions and Security Project of the Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies at the University of Notre Dame said the following:

"There has been a repeated call in all of the Iraq resolutions that calls for a Mideast zone free of weapons of mass destruction… And a lot of folks in the Middle East region are very concerned because the Israelis have nuclear weapons, they have Jericho missiles and other things deployable long-distance… and the UN has not acted on those. No one ever says that's the death knell for the United Nations. Most people in the region see that it's not even-handed, it's favouritism, and they don't like it."

Fellow panellist Ken Adelman, former U.S. ambassador to the UN, did not challenge Millar at the time, even though he later said his interest is in removing "weapons of mass destruction in the hands of the most vicious, awful dictators in the world."

Against considerable resistance, Adelman tried to make a distinction between enforcing UN resolutions on weapons in the hands of dangerous, unstable despots, and armaments belonging to responsible governments.

This essential distinction is apparently lost not merely on commentators with radical political agendas, but also on intelligent and conscientious columnists.

For instance, on Feb. 2, Global-TV public affairs program Global Sunday aired a discussion about media responsibility. Toronto Star columnist Linda McQuaig spoke about the need to achieve balance. She complained, appropriately, that "there's far too much focus on certain subjects and not on others."

The rub, however, lay in her illustration: "Just take something that's in the news constantly these days: weapons of mass destruction in Iraq. Why only the focus on weapons of mass destruction in Iraq? What about weapons of mass destruction in Washington, in Russia, in Israel, in Pakistan, in India?"

Why didn't McQuaig also cite France or Britain or cite North Korea's nuclear weapons program, also much in the news these days?

At least McQuaig did not single out Israel, which so often happens. Still, she mixed subjects that don't belong together – the perfectly valid consideration of what to do with weapons of mass destruction in general and the necessity of dealing specifically with Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein, who has been ordered by countless UN Security Council resolutions to give up these weapons. No such resolutions are pending against the United States, Britain, France or Israel for the simple reason that these countries are not deemed a threat to world peace. These democratic countries must be distinguished from unstable, non-democratic regimes such as Pakistan and North Korea.

Even if four out of 10 of Canadians believe that U.S. President George W. Bush is a greater threat to international peace and security than Saddam (EKOS poll, December 2002), it still does not justify McQuaig's baseless conflation of categories and political leaders.

Especially in a time of world crisis, it is all the more essential that we think clearly about the real issues.

Students learn to fight bigotry

By PHYLLIS SHRAGGE
Staff Reporter

HAMILTON — High school students participating in the Asper Foundation Holocaust and human rights studies program have an opportunity to combat anti-Semitism at its roots, says the local chair of the program.

"If you are armed with knowledge, you can fight anti-Semitism," says Dr. Nadia Rosa, a Holocaust survivor who recalls her internment in Theresienstadt concentration camp vividly, even though she was just seven years old when the camp was liberated.

"The question you often get, is how six million Jews could go like lambs to the slaughter. When I hear that, it shows me there is no knowledge of what transpired. It's important to learn how the Holocaust evolved," Rosa said in an interview.

Hamilton students in the Holocaust education program are taught history as it relates to the Holocaust beginning with the Treaty of Versailles in 1919, and including events leading up to World War II.

The program, which was initiated in Winnipeg in 1997, expanded into a national program in 2000. This year, 13 cities across Canada are participating.

Its objectives are to promote tolerance and sensitize Canadian high school students to the consequences of racism, as well as gain an understanding of the vital role each person plays in the defence of human rights.

Students participate in a comprehensive three-part learning experience which includes up to 18 hours of classroom instruction on the Holocaust and human rights, a four-day trip to Washington, D.C. focusing on the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, and a commitment of 16 hours of volunteer work in the community.

The local program, which is jointly funded by the Asper Foundation and UJA Federation of Hamilton, is open to students in grades 9, 10 and 11 at a cost of $350 per student, and is limited to 15 students who were required to write a 300-word essay about why they wanted to participate.

Tentative dates for the Washington trip are May 18 to 21. Hamilton students will join students from London and Windsor for the trip, which includes a visit to the Smithsonian Institute and other historical sites.

Canada's first Israeli artist series

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Music lover Karla Berbrayer is attracting attention in Jewish communities across Canada with her new Israeli Artists Series.

"I am excited that Winnipeg is the first city in Canada to host this kind of series featuring leading Israeli musicians," Berbrayer says.

The first concert in the series, on Jan. 29, featured Eyal Ein-Habar, the co-principal flautist with the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra in Tel Aviv.

"I heard Eyal perform in Israel along with an Israeli pianist," Berbrayer says. "I couldn't afford to fly in both of them. I booked Eyal because he was supposed to be coming to New York at the end of January with the philharmonic. I would have just had to fly him from New York. But the tour fell through."

Ein-Habar was so anxious to come to Winnipeg that he paid his own way to Montreal and developed a mini-Canadian tour with performances in Montreal and Quebec City, Berbrayer adds. As his accompanist, he signed on pianist Suzanne Goyette of the Conservatoire de musique de Québec.

Berbrayer's interest in music and performance is longstanding. As a young adult, she toured the world with the musical troupe Up With People.

After her marriage to Dr. Allen Kraut, she moved to New York where she organized a performing arts series in Harlem and was involved with an international ballet competition. The couple moved back to Winnipeg 13 years ago to start a family.

Five years ago, Berbrayer approached the newly opened Rady Jewish Community Centre about starting a new program, which came to be called the Music and Mavens Series and offered afternoon concerts by local musicians and lectures. The program, which Berbrayer puts together, is prepared in collaboration with the University of Winnipeg.

She says she first conceived of the Israeli Artists Series two years ago when she and her family planned to spend a year in Israel while her husband was on sabbatical.

In Israel, she took in as many concerts and heard as many musicians as she had time for.

"I wanted to get a feel for modern Israeli culture," she says. "I really soaked it up. It occurred to me that in Winnipeg, we were lacking exposure to Israeli cultural trends. We have a sense of folklore, but not the wider cultural mosaic."

After she returned home, she approached Hal Bordy, the Rady Centre executive director, with her idea for the artists series. He agreed to support her if she could find the funding.

"I met with a number of people and everyone thought it was a great idea," she says. "I was able to gather enough funds to ensure this would work."

She consulted the Israeli Consulate in Toronto for help and visited Israel again last summer with her family. In Israel, she auditioned several performers.

"I have a large library of CDs from Israeli musicians now," she says. "They are all eager to come to Canada. In fact, I am hearing from Israeli artists from all over the world."

Coming up in the series on April 5 is the Silver-Garburg Duo on piano. On May 7, vocalist Idit Banit and her accompanist, Oded Shmueli, both from the Galil, will be headlining the Jewish community's Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

The Banit and Shmueli concert is being co-sponsored by the Partnership 2000 link between the Winnipeg community and communities in the Galil. The two musicians will be in Winnipeg for six days.

Berbrayer is already working on next year's line-up. And she says she has been approached by other Canadian Jewish communities who want to plug into her program.

Former Vancouver rabbi returning for visit

By PETER CAULFIELD
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — When former Congregation Beth Hamidrash spiritual leader Rabbi Yosef Benarroch, his wife, Elana, and their seven children left Vancouver in 1999 and moved to Israel, they gave themselves two years to adjust. Learning how to live in a new country – and how to survive the second intifadah – hasn't been easy, but the Benarrochs love their new home.

In an e-mail interview, Rabbi Benarroch said making aliyah should be a natural move for every Jew.

"Israel is our home, so naturally, a Jew should always be thinking about coming home," the rabbi said.

Rabbi Benarroch will be in Vancouver later this month to talk about his family's life in Israel and the impact of the second intifadah on the country.

His talk is titled From Efrat to Jerusalem: Life on Israel's Frontline and will be the keynote address of a Sephardi fundraiser Feb. 25 at the Wosk Auditorium in Congregation Schara Tzedeck. The event is being held to raise funds for the completion of Congregation Beth Hamidrash's new synagogue.

Rabbi Yosef Benarroch

Rabbi Benarroch said he and Elana began thinking seriously about the move when their oldest daughter, Ruchama, was finishing elementary school.

"We had three options," he said. "The first was to send her away to the east for school. The second was to move east and find the right schools for her and our other children. And the third was to make aliyah. We chose aliyah because we realized that the older our children got, the more difficult it would be."

The Benarrochs chose to settle in Efrat, which is just south of Jerusalem.

"We chose Efrat because of its close proximity to Jerusalem and because of its slower-paced lifestyle and relative quiet," Rabbi Benarroch said.

But the last two-and-a-half years have been anything but quiet.

"The intifadah has turned travel to and from Efrat into a great risk," he said. "I personally have had stones thrown at my car on a number of occasions, most recently in the middle of January. Friends have been shot at and my wife lost a close friend last year."

Rabbi Benarroch, who led Congregation Beth Hamidrash between 1991 and 1999, said that "the eight years we lived in Vancouver were a dream come true. The community was everything a rabbi could hope for."

Rabbi Benarroch said he misses certain things about Jewish life in North America

When the time came to choose between staying in Canada and moving to Israel, the decision was difficult.

"It wasn't a question of not liking North America, it's that there were just things that we wanted that didn't exist here, the most important being a proper educational environment for our children," the rabbi said.

"I felt my time in Vancouver as a God-sent mission," he said. "To be involved in a community and to bring people closer to Torah and their Jewish roots is, to me, the most important mission to be on. So we were very torn when the time came to decide whether to leave or not."

Rabbi Benarroch said he misses certain things about Jewish life in North America.

"One that immediately comes to mind is more openness, especially between the religious and non-religious. I could look out at the congregation of Beth Hamidrash on any given Shabbat and see so many different people attending services, from observant to non-observant. In Israel, non-observant people just don't attend synagogues and feel very alienated from religious life."

YORK UNIVERSITY
The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University
Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

Graduate Diploma in Advanced Hebrew and Jewish Studies
and
Graduate Diploma in Jewish Studies

In conjunction with the Faculty of Graduate Studies, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University offers two Graduate Diplomas in Jewish Studies. One may be earned while enrolled in a graduate degree program at York University, the other may be earned independently, without enrolling in a concurrent program.

Diploma study will introduce students to the broad range of Jewish Studies from the study of classical texts to the sociology of contemporary Jewry. The diplomas will afford students an opportunity to enrich their knowledge of Judaism and Jewry, to increase their Hebrew language competence, and to acquire research skills in the field.

The diplomas are appropriate for scholars in Jewish history, texts, social sciences, and other areas; teachers in Jewish schools; community workers; and anyone else with a serious interest in Jewish Studies.

Some scholarships are available for graduate research in Jewish studies and for study in Israel.

For further information and applications, please see our website at http://www.yorku.ca/grads/cal/js2.htm. You may also contact Professor Michael Brown (michaelb@yorku.ca) and Professor Sara R. Horowitz (srh@yorku.ca), Diploma Coordinators; Tel: 416-736-5823; Fax 416-736-5344.

In particular, that responsibility falls on the shoulders of the prime minister, Mulroney said. "It is the prime minister's responsibility to lead on the great moral issues of the day."

He recalled how William Lyon Mackenzie King, who was Canada's prime minister from 1921 to 1948, wrote in his diary that Adolf Hitler "is really one who truly loves his fellow man."

Mulroney said King had a "visceral distrust of Jews" and was prime minister at a time when "Canada was slammed shut to Jewish immigrants."

"Because of Ottawa's abdication of moral leadership, countless Jews perished in Hitler's death camps, and we as a country were deprived of them, their children and the glory of their lives."

'We faithfully support Israel'

Mulroney said while he was prime minister, he took a clear stance on anti-Semitism by, among other things, appointing the Deschenes Commission of Inquiry on Nazi War Criminals in Canada and supporting the State of Israel.

"For nine years, we... faithfully support[ed] Israel at home and around the world. As prime minister, I saw to that personally."

Leading scholars from across North America have come to the conference to explore the roots of anti-Semitism and develop policies needed to respond to it today.

Mulroney said he was invited to speak by Janice Gross Stein, a University of Toronto professor and director of the Munk Centre for International Studies, the major sponsor of the conference.

"As academics, we have an obligation not only to analyze... but to inform the wider public," Stein said.

Dignitaries on hand for the dinner and speech included former Ontario premier Mike Harris and former Ontario lieutenant-governor Hal Jackman.

Speaking to reporters after the speech, Mulroney took aim at key Canadian government officials who participated in the United Nations' conference against racism in Durban, South Africa, in September 2001, which turned into an anti-Israel affair.

He termed the conference a "disgrace" and said it had the potential to damage Canada's international reputation.

Mulroney also expressed concern that Canada's relationship with the United States could be hampered without a clear Canadian stance on the Iraq issue.

"We run the risk of becoming completely marginalized," Mulroney said.

Thousands of mourners pay final respects to Daniel Arato

CALGARY — Some 1,400 mourners filled Beth Tzedec Synagogue here last week for the emotionally charged funeral of Daniel Jonathan Arato, one of seven teenagers killed Feb. 1 by a massive avalanche in the Rogers Pass of British Columbia while on a much-criticized school ski trip.

Many of those present at the funeral were Daniel's classmates, clad in the green and blue uniforms of Strathcona-Tweedsmuir School, a private institution that emphasizes leadership training for its students.

Daniel, 15, was eulogized as "a magic thinker [whose] imagination ran rampant", by his father Peter, a Calgary engineer.

The family moved to Calgary from Toronto in 1996. Peter Arato was raised in Toronto; his wife Judith was raised in Brazil, and her parents are Holocaust survivors. They are members of Calgary's Temple B'nai Tikvah, where Daniel had his bar mitzvah in 2001.

"Our community will miss Daniel's innocence, his light-hearted spirit, his sensitivity and devotion to his brother Thomas and his parents, and his creative free spirit both in and out of the classroom," stated Rabbi Howard Voss-Altman. "We grieve for what might have been, for joys unrealized, for tasks undone, for growth arrested, for love blighted, for challenges unmet."

Daniel was recalled as an all-round sports enthusiast who taught himself how to ride a unicycle, performed magic tricks for children, juggled, and danced "with all the girls."

"Dan was like a shooting star in many of our lives – many like it, but none the same. It lights up the sky and then it's gone, never to be seen again," said his best friend and brother, Thomas, 18, the only remaining child of Peter and Judith. "There are no words to describe my sorrow, no condolences to ease my sadness," Thomas said. "I loved being a big brother."

Daniel was a member of B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO). On Sunday, Feb. 2, about 80 young people gathered at the Calgary Jewish Centre for a hasty memorial.

The family asked for memorials in their son's name to the Children's Wish Foundation.

Israeli-Palestinian talks resume

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — After months of inactivity, the Israeli-Palestinian diplomatic track is showing some faint signs of life.

According to reports published last week, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met Feb. 5 in Jerusalem with Ahmed Karia, the speaker of the Palestinian legislative council, as part of efforts to renew high-level contacts between the two sides.

In addition, Dov Weisglass, who heads the Prime Minister's Office, met last week with the Palestinian officials in charge of finance and interior affairs.

Some observers question the significance of the meetings, which were followed by continued violence.

During his meeting with Karia, Sharon reportedly offered the Palestinians a gradual ceasefire.

He proposed that the Palestinian Authority choose one or two cities for which it will assume full security responsibility. If the Palestinian Authority takes action to halt terrorist attacks, Israel will withdraw its troops from those areas and ease restrictions on the Palestinian population.

In the discussions, Sharon repeated his refusal to negotiate with PA President Yasser Arafat. Sharon also laid out three conditions for the resumption of negotiations with the Palestinians: replacement of the Palestinian leadership; implementation of comprehensive PA reforms; and an end to terrorism.

Although Weisglass was expected to hold further meetings with Palestinian officials in the coming days, political observers were cautious to herald any real diplomatic movement just yet.

Instead, they suggested, there could be two factors behind the public disclosure of last week's meetings: the looming U.S.-led war with Iraq and Sharon's negotiations with Israeli political parties about creating the next government.

The Israeli daily Ma'ariv suggested last week's talks were held following pressure from the United States, which hopes signs of progress on the Israeli-Palestinian track will help generate international support for its campaign against Iraq.

Critics question whether they will yield results

Although Arafat said over the weekend that he welcomed the renewed Israeli-Palestinian talks, one Palestinian official, Sufian Abu Zaide, accused Sharon of not being serious about diplomatic progress with the Palestinians. Instead, he said, Sharon is motivated by domestic political interests.

While sources close to Sharon say contacts with the Palestinians preceded Israel's Jan. 28 elections, observers have suggested that Sharon is interested in demonstrating his willingness to negotiate with the Palestinians as part of efforts to convince Israel's Labor Party to join a unity government.

On Sunday, President Moshe Katsav formally invited Sharon to form the next government. Under the law, Sharon has six weeks to form a new coalition.

At the ceremony, Sharon invited "all Zionist parties" to join a broad-based coalition. He also called on Labor Party leader Amram Mitzna to join his government, saying if Mitzna carries through on his repeated refusals to do so it would be a "breach of public faith."

Top Labor officials decided last week that the party should not enter a government led by Sharon. On Sunday, former prime minister Shimon Peres said that unless Sharon changes his positions, the contacts with the Palestinians will not lead anywhere.

Mitzna is reportedly considering calling for new leadership elections in the party as early as May or June. Mitzna may submit the proposal at an upcoming meeting of the party's central committee, Ha'aretz reported.

Under the Labor Party constitution, elections for a new leader must be held within 14 months of losing an election. Sources close to Mitzna reportedly believe that the sooner primaries are held, the better his chances of defeating such potential rivals as former party chairman Benjamin Ben-Eliezer or legislators Matan Vilnai and Avraham Burg.

Meanwhile, violence continued on the ground.

On Sunday, three Palestinians were killed in a suicide car bombing outside an Israeli army post in southern Gaza. Two Israeli soldiers were lightly injured in the blast and two others were treated for shock.

The three Palestinians first opened fire on the position from their car, and then drove up to it and detonated the explosives.

In the West Bank on Sunday, Israeli troops arrested a Palestinian near Nablus who they said was planning to carry out a suicide attack.

In another incident, Israeli police found a suicide bomber's belt with 33 pounds of explosives Feb. 6 in a mosque. The belt was found after security forces arrested two members of Islamic Jihad who were on their way to carry out a suicide bombing in Israel.

Interrogation of the pair and another Palestinian suspected of involvement in the planned attack revealed that the terrorists had entered Israel previously, with one of them wearing the explosive belt.

Because of tight security, however, the two hid the belt in the bathroom of a mosque in the Israeli Arab town of Taiba. They then returned to the West Bank, planning to pick up the explosives for an attack that may have been planned for last Friday, police said.

IDF reverses suicide bombers' success-failure ratio

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

The Israeli defence establishment can derive some satisfaction from two recent turns in the war on terror. One is the recent efforts by the Palestinian Authority – the first such in a long time – to halt the firing of Kassam rockets from Gaza into Israel.

The second is statistical. There are still suicide bombings, and they will apparently continue in the coming months, but the ratio of successful to failed attempts has changed radically.

The Israel Defence Forces (IDF) now foils about 15 suicide bombings for every one that succeeds.

Optimists could view both of these developments as the first tentative confirmation of the general staff's recent assessment that "the worst of the conflict with the Palestinians is already behind us" – and in the light of the anticipated American attack on Iraq, which Chief of Staff Moshe Ya'alon expects to produce "a regional earthquake."

Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz made one recent comment that attracted little attention in Israel, but the Palestinians noted it very carefully. He said in interview with Israel Radio that if the Kassam rocket fire from Gaza continued, Israel would consider re-occupying the Gaza Strip. Although an invasion is far from happening – and the wisdom of it is hotly disputed within the IDF – yet this was no slip of the tongue.

"The Palestinians are developing a real fear of losing the strip," a senior general staff officer told Ha'aretz. "Mofaz made them made them worry that what has already happened in the West Bank will happen in Gaza as well. So far the PA has succeeded in retaining relative control in Gaza. Its senior officials have much to lose if their reign there collapses."

The Palestinians are very aware of something that most Israelis have barely noticed – before the outbreak of the Intifadah in September 2000, Gaza was a Palestinian "sea" with a few "islands" of settlements, but it is now a collection of isolated Palestinian enclaves surrounded by wide "corridors" controlled by the IDF. They also understand that IDF operations to stop the rocket fire, such as those now being conducted around Beit Hanun, could easily be transformed into a permanent IDF presence in these areas.

Another reason for the PA activities – so far limited to a few arrests and a raid on a Hamas rocket warehouse – is the ineffectiveness of the rocket fire. The rockets have caused almost no damage, yet have provoked harsh Israeli retaliation deep inside Gaza. When the Palestinian militias urge their members to confront IDF tanks, these confrontations usually end with many dead militants and widespread damage to the surrounding area – causing many of the residents to oppose such confrontations.

The failure of the recent Cairo talks, which the Palestinian Authority viewed as a "slap in the face," also prompted it to start taking action. Hamas was strengthened by the talks – Egypt recognized it as the PA's de facto equal – without conceding anything in exchange. Mofaz believes Hamas has already become an alternative that threatens future PA rule.

The IDF does not believe the PA can halt the rocket fire for long. But it does believe that all of the above developments have strengthened the feeling among certain key Palestinian officials – such as Mohammed Dahlan and Rashid Abu-Shabak – that the intifadah has exhausted its usefulness, and the current efforts against the Kassams are a sign of this.

In addition to invading Gaza, Israel has one other threat against the Palestinians – expelling PA Chairman Yasser Arafat. For the first time since the intifadah began, there is unanimity among Israel's top officials – the prime minister and the defence and foreign ministers – that this needs to be done, and an operational plan already exists. Foreign reports say the elite Sayeret Matkal unit rehearsed it as far back as Operation Defensive Shield last April.

What is needed now is an opportunity. Once the war on Iraq begins, American opposition to Arafat's expulsion might soften. Then, one mass-casualty attack on Israel and Arafat will be gone. Such an attack is not unlikely, since both money and orders for attacks have reportedly been arriving at an accelerated rate recently – mainly from Iran, but also from Syria and Iraq.

In addition to its success in putting pressure on the Palestinian Authority, the IDF has also dramatically improved its ability to foil suicide bombings inside Israel. IDF statistics report 15 foiled suicide bombings inside Israel against two successful ones in October, 19 against two in November, 15 against zero in December, and 15 against one in January. Last March – the month before Defensive Shield – there were eight foiled attacks against 17 successful ones.

Of course, the figures say nothing about casualties. In November, despite only two successful suicide bombings inside Israel, 44 Israelis were killed. This number includes the victims of the attack in Mombasa, Kenya, attacks in the territories and two shooting attacks inside Israel. In January, 30 Israelis were killed, 23 of them in the one successful suicide bombing inside Israel.

But the IDF believes the number of successful attacks inside Israel will decline further once the northern part of the security fence is finished in July.

Deputy chief of staff Gaby Ashkenazy, the fence's leading advocate in the IDF, says the fence's sophisticated technology will reduce the manpower needed for patrols along the Green Line.

French film blasts media on Mideast

By PHILIP CARMEL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

PARIS — Even after 10 screenings a day for the past two weeks, a film charging that the French media are biased against Israel is still playing to packed houses in Paris.

The film, Décryptage or Decoding, has caught the mood of French Jews who long have felt that the French media's depiction of the Mideast has a pro-Palestinian slant.

The film's producers, Jacques Tarnero and Philippe Bensoussan, say it is "an opinion piece rather than a documentary." But the film has succeeded in provoking debate in the French media, not only for its content but also for the fact that it appears to have struck a chord among French Jews.

Each day, French Jews have gathered outside the Arlequin cinema in the heart of Paris's movie district on the Left Bank, in what often appears more a gesture of solidarity with Israel than a desire for a night out.

The lines stretch down the street, and people who can't get tickets are forced to return for later showings.

"People come to feel united. It's something between personal therapy, a family visit, the synagogue and a football game," Bensoussan said.

Indeed, the vast majority of viewers are Jews, a fact that irritates some in the audience.

"I knew everyone in there," student David Biton, 17, told JTA. "It's a good film, but it's much more important for non-Jews to see it. They should put it on at other cinemas. It's difficult enough as it is just to get tickets here."

Biton came to see the film with three friends, all classmates from his Jewish school in Paris. Most of his family and friends had seen the movie, he said, but he had had little success persuading non-Jewish friends to come.

"They should put it on TV," Biton said. "Then people might see the truth instead of the disinformation they constantly feed us."

Décryptage claims that there is a persistent campaign by important sections of the French media – most notably the leading daily, Le Monde, and the international press agency, Agence France Presse – to blame Israel for the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000.

> 'Major French television channels consciously and deliberately blamed Israel'

The film charges that major French television channels consciously and deliberately blamed Israel's then-opposition leader Ariel Sharon for the violence that began the day after his visit to the Temple Mount in Jerusalem.

Moreover, the film details what it describes as evidence that the Palestinian Authority planned the intifadah while it was involved in peace negotiations with Israel, details that were ignored or glossed over by French media.

The film also includes footage of how Palestinian children are educated to hate Israel and Jews, and it strongly criticizes the portrayal by the France 2 television channel of the death of a young Palestinian teenager in Israeli-Palestinian crossfire in the Gaza Strip in October 2000.

The image of the boy's death, captured by a French cameraman, became one of the indelible early images of the intifadah and was used to whip up anti-Israel sentiment around the world – even though investigations later showed that he might well have been killed by a Palestinian bullet.

But the film is not simply a defence of the current Israeli government; indeed, both Tarnero and Bensoussan are somewhat left of centre when it comes to the Middle East.

Rather, they were motivated to produce Décryptage by what Tarnero describes as "a hateful holding to account of Israel and an intellectual scandal in France and in Europe."

"We have nothing against criticism of the policies of the government of the State of Israel," Tarnero says in the film's preamble. "But what we have seen for two years now, and under the appearance of political criticism, is just demonization, defamation and denunciation" of Israel.

The film takes as its starting point the 1995 assassination of Israel's then-prime minister, Yitzhak Rabin. It includes interviews with leading members of Israel's peace camp, including prime minister Ehud Barak and his foreign minister, Shlomo Ben-Ami, as well as left-wing intellectuals in Israel and France.

From the moment of its release Jan. 22, Décryptage has received much publicity in the French media, though many publications accused it of presenting only one point of view.

Typical were the comments of Ange-Dominique Bouzet in the centre-left daily Libération, which itself comes in for criticism in the film. Bouzet described Décryptage as a "propaganda documentary" that is part of "a militant attempt at disinformation."

However, Philippe Cohen of Marianne magazine noted that Décryptage was very much "a symptom of the fracture between those who guard Palestine in their hearts and those who live Israel in their guts."

Later, even Libération ran a two-page spread on Décryptage, describing it as a "docu-mirror of French Jews.

"Décryptage has mobilized the community," the paper said.

Marianne also wondered whether campaigns for more balanced media coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict were starting to have an effect.

Criticizing the tendency of the French media to see things in black-and-white terms, Marianne publisher, Jean-Francois Kahn, wrote that the media are "generally pro-Palestinian, in the same way [they were or are] pro-Biafran, pro-Bangladeshi, pro-Bosnian or pro-Chechen."

Nevertheless, there was an increasing attempt within the media to adopt a more balanced approach to Jewish and Israeli matters, "and we can only rejoice about that," he said.

Even among Jews lining up at the Arlequin, there was agreement on that score.

"You know, I watch TV here and I see the news, but I have children in Israel so I see both sides," Suzy Soussan told JTA. "But it's getting better here and there's a lot less negative reporting because, finally, the community is doing something about it."

Décryptage ends with the famous quote from Hillel: "If I am not for myself, who will be for me?"

With the seats at the Arlequin still filled to capacity, French Jews appear to have taken the message very much to heart.

Canadians told to ready for possible evacuation from Israel

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — The Canadian Embassy in Israel is calling on all its citizens in Israel to ensure that their passports are valid and to register with its offices "in view of the Iraq situation" and in the event they need to be contacted "on short notice."

In direct letters to those citizens already registered with the embassy, Canada's ambassador to Israel, Michael Bell, called on them to confirm the validity of their travel documents and be ready for the possibility of evacuating the country on short notice. For its part, Air Canada said it does not intend to cease its flights to Israel in case of war in Iraq.

Ties between Israel and Canada in the field of aviation security are expected to be tightened following a recent meeting between representatives from Canada's Aviation Safety Authority, headed by deputy director for operations, Marc Duncan, and the head of Israel's Civil Aviation Authority, Amos Amir.

Meanwhile, the U.S. embassy in Israel said Monday it would start evacuating non-essential personnel and diplomats' families this week, with a U.S.-led war against Iraq looming.

Paul Patin, an embassy spokesperson in Tel Aviv, said non-essential staff and diplomats' families have been on "authorized departure status" since last Friday, when the U.S. State Department advised all but essential diplomats, along with family members, to leave Israel, Jordan, Syria and Lebanon.

Patin confirmed that several people had said they intended to leave Israel, with the first group flying out this week. The spokesperson said some individuals had already left last Saturday.

"All non-essential staff and their families are on authorized departure status," said Patin, which means that they are allowed to leave if they want to. Those who do leave will be leaving on regular commercial flights.

The embassy would remain open for normal operations despite the evacuations, the official said.

Citing "increased security concerns", the U.S. State Department said last Friday it had decided to offer embassy dependants and non-emergency staff in Israel, Syria, Jordan, and Lebanon free flights home – known as an "authorized departure".

But it said the move did not mean that war with Iraq was imminent or inevitable. However, the United States took similar steps before the 1991 Gulf War against Iraq.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2003 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 21, 2003. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 28, 2003.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 13, 2003. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Shoah education in Germany faces hurdles

By TOBY AXELROD
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BERLIN — The taxi driver shot a questioning glance over her shoulder. "What's going on?" she asked, noting the flocks of guests arriving at the Konrad Adenauer Foundation building in central Berlin.

"It's a Holocaust Remembrance Day program," she was told.

"Ach, ja," she said. And then: "I have to tell you: I have had it up to here with that subject. It feels like, well, like a kind of blackmail from the Israeli government."

Such sentiments are all too common here.

A December 2002 study by the American Jewish Committee showed that 52 per cent of Germans believe "Jews use Holocaust remembrance to their own advantage."

Another survey, released last November by the Institute for Interdisciplinary Research on Conflict and Violence in Bielefeld, Germany, found 22 per cent agreed without reservation – and up to 80 per cent more or less agreed – that "Many Jews try to take advantage today of the history of the Third Reich, and the Germans pay for this."

These views are a troubling sign that not all is right with Holocaust education in Germany, according to historian Matthias Heyl, head of educational services at the Ravensbruck concentration camp memorial.

"I hear students say they have had enough, and there seems to be a connection between lack of knowledge and that statement," Heyl said. "It sounds like a playback of what their grandmother and grandfather said back in the early postwar years."

"This attitude has been encouraged by certain intellectuals in Germany, and it is spreading," said Beate Kosmala, a senior historian at Berlin's Center for Research on Anti-Semitism.

"A really good education on the Holocaust would make the dimensions of the crimes so clear that one could no longer make such arguments," Kosmala said.

But "it is not easy to teach this era of history to young Germans," said Deidre Berger, head of the American Jewish Committee's Berlin office, which has commissioned a pilot study of the impact of Holocaust education on German high school students.

"It is a very grim chapter, for which young people today bear no guilt or responsibility," Berger said. "Nevertheless, it is a part of the history of this nation which cannot be forgotten or overlooked."

German educators have had many hurdles to overcome, and a timeline of schoolbooks tells the tale: from postwar avoidance to displacement of responsibility onto a few high-level Nazis to the confrontation with local and family history – and, finally, to the clash between East and West German interpretations of the past.

Since unification in 1990, much has been done to knock down the former East Germany's view of itself as guilt-free and of West Germany as the repository of Nazi evil.

"There definitely has been a change in the last few years, with a lot of new curricula, including new historical information," Kosmala said.

"And in Berlin and other big cities, there are many survivors who are invited to the schools. In my experience, these people are often very surprised by the interest among students."

In 1996, the establishment of a Holocaust Remembrance Day in Germany by then-president Roman Herzog provided a rallying point for long-term educational programs.

This was evident at the recent "Remembrance Day on the Internet" program sponsored by the Konrad Adenauer Foundation, in which students from across Germany won awards.

In contrast to the game-show atmosphere at the prize ceremony, the student projects were serious and thoughtful. They included interviews with Holocaust survivors and with their own grandparents, as well as with youths who recently left Germany's right-wing extremist scene.

"We wanted to put our thoughts together so others would profit from it," said Juliane Ziegler, 16, a student at the Luckau Gymnasium.

She and her fellow classmates created a Web site about their visit to the Auschwitz concentration camp memorial and their meetings with Polish students.

Such commitment and interest appear to be rare, according to Philip Graf von Hardenberg, managing director of Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah Visual History Foundation in Berlin.

Speaking at a Jan. 27 discussion on "Remembrance in an Entertainment Culture," Hardenberg said it is "embarrassing" how few schools had participated in the foundation's first competition on Holocaust-related topics, which was held in 2001.

And of 120,000 schools contacted, only 130 wanted to purchase the Shoah Foundation's CD-Rom, which features interviews with German Jewish Holocaust survivors, he said.

Some believe a poor Holocaust education has dangerous results.

Paul Spiegel, president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, recently said "deficiencies in the educational system" are partly to blame for anti-Semitism in Germany.

But Heyl doubts Holocaust education can inoculate Germany against today's societal problems, and he prefers not to link the two.

Today's Holocaust education, in Germany and elsewhere, focuses increasingly on "confronting the perspective and individual choices of bystanders, perpetrators and rescuers," and not only of victims, Heyl said.

A pitfall of Holocaust education is that persecuted groups often are seen only as victims.

"We do not work enough on Jewish history and culture in Germany," Heyl said.

That is where Arthur Obermayer, an American Jewish businessman with roots in Germany, comes in.

Three years ago he created the German Jewish History Award to honour non-Jewish Germans who are trying to ensure that the Jewish history of their hometowns isn't forgotten.

This year's winners helped save synagogues and Jewish cemeteries from oblivion, reached out to Jews who once lived in their towns and created archives for future researchers. Their projects are described at www.obermayer.us/award.

Without the work of such people, "all the speeches" given on Holocaust Remembrance Day "would be hot air," Michel Friedman, vice president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, told honorees and guests at the recent award ceremony.

"You are the bridge builders in the fullest sense of the word."

Ukraine Jews say fear led to low numbers in recent census

By DANIEL MACISAAC
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

KIEV, Ukraine — Ukraine's first national census since independence took into account a number of demographic factors, but perhaps not the "fear factor."

That, at least, is how many observers are explaining the discrepancy between their estimates that some 250,000 to 500,000 Jews live in Ukraine and the 103,591 counted in the 2001 census, which was released in late December 2002.

"Many people are afraid to say that they're Jews," said the chief rabbi of Kiev, Moshe-Reuven Azman. "Right now we have a democracy and everything is fine, but you never know what will happen. We don't know the future but we have a history here, and we're afraid."

Ukraine's last census, conducted in 1989 when it was still part of the Soviet Union, counted some 52 million people, including 487,300 Jews.

Since that time, emigration and a low birth rate have contributed to an overall decrease in Ukraine's population by almost 3 million people, to the current total of slightly less than 48.5 million.

Freedom of movement and a deteriorating economy have led thousands of Ukrainian Jews to move to Israel or to countries such as Germany and the United States. Even accounting for that, however, many observers say the census' Jewish numbers don't add up.

Azman said many Jews didn't disclose their ethnic identity, preferring to opt for the security of belonging to a majority group.

"Ten years ago, people had a Soviet passport and had no choice over what nationality was recorded in it, but now they have a Ukrainian passport and don't have to indicate" another nationality, he said.

The practice may go back even further: A doctor working at a private medical clinic in Kiev, who identified herself only as Anya, said that after her parents' personal documents were lost during World War II, they chose to suppress their Jewish identity, even after the war ended.

She said she has many friends in a similar situation, raised in families where Jewish traditions are passed from generation to generation, but official Jewish identity is not.

"My parents knew how difficult life could be for Jews in Ukraine and changed their identity," Anya said. "So if the government wants to know about my status, it will never find out."

Alex Kupershtein, a Lviv-born Israeli citizen and director of the Makabi restaurant in Kiev, agreed. "I have a lot of friends in Kiev whose parents are still afraid to say that they are Jewish."

A spokesperson for Ukraine's State Statistics Committee said it could not interpret the 2001 census results. "But personally," she said, "I think the numbers look right when you consider the emigration that has taken place."

She said more details on ethnicity in Ukraine will be available when the census is released in published form later this year.

But most Jewish groups aren't waiting to express their conviction that Jews have been vastly undercounted.

According to surveys by the Jewish Agency for Israel, there are 215,000 to 220,000 Jews in Ukraine, said Alex Katz, head of Jewish Agency operations in Ukraine and Moldova. "I hope that at least in the case of the major Ukrainian cities we'll succeed in finding more Jews than have been counted now," he said.

Other Jewish leaders agree. The chief rabbi of Ukraine, Ya'akov Dov Bleich, said the real number is closer to 500,000 Jews, or five times the census figure.

Josef Zissels, chairman of the Va'ad umbrella group of Jewish organizations in Ukraine, said that at least 150,000 Ukrainians are Jewish according to Jewish law, meaning that they have a Jewish mother. Including those with a Jewish spouse or at least one Jewish grandparent, some 400,000 individuals would qualify to immigrate to Israel under its Law of Return, he said.

The census figure makes sense only if it counts those people with two Jewish parents, he said.

Zissels said it would be helpful to have a better understanding of the number of Jews and their position in Ukrainian society. He's hoping to find funding for his own census, which he feels will provide more accurate results.

"I'd like to conduct a census that deals not only with demographics but which is also sociological," Zissels said.

"That way we'd understand better how Jews in Ukraine are living, what schools they attend, what newspapers they read and who their parents and grandparents are."

Steven Schwager, executive vice president of the American Jewish Joint Jewish Distribution Committee, also believes the census may represent a partial picture. The New York-based group assists community-building and renewal efforts by Ukrainian Jews.

"In the last 10 years... the JDC [has] helped dozens of new communal Jewish organizations evolve in Ukraine," Schwager said. "Those organizations alone reach a number of Jews far larger than the figure quoted in the census."

The JDC said the census results won't affect its work in Ukraine, where it's best known for its Chesed system of welfare programs for elderly Jews.

Eduard Dolinsky, executive director of the United Jewish Community of Ukraine umbrella group, said that after speaking with many elderly recipients of JDC-sponsored programs, he understands the fear factor Azman cites.

"Many older Jews told me they did not put their nationality in the questionnaire, because even after 10 years of Ukrainian independence they are still afraid to show their Jewish origins," he said. "I assume that more than 200,000 Jews did not answer correctly."

Ukrainian Jews are not alone in seeking shelter amid the majority when dealing with the government. The 2001 census also saw a decrease in the number of people identifying themselves as ethnic Russians and an increase in the number of ethnic Ukrainians, who make up nearly 78 per cent of the population.

Oleksy Haran, director of the School for Policy Analysis at Kyiv-Mohyla Academy, explained that in 1989 more people identified themselves as Russians because of a desire to belong to the largest ethnic group in the Soviet Union.

Yana Yanover, director of the Jewish Education Center in Kiev, argues that the fear factor can't be underestimated.

Biblical story is turned into a hip-hop musical

By HEATHER SOLOMON
Special to The CJN

Can the victims of corporate layoffs be thought of as modern-day Jobs? According to performing partners Eli Batalion and Jerome Saibil, the threat of being downsized is a painful test for workers in the 21st century, just as Job was tested.

In their play Job: The Hip-Hop Musical, the two update the age-old Bible story with contemporary street smarts and pop culture.

'Street smarts, pop culture'

Job runs Feb. 25 to March 9 at the Tarragon Extra Space in Toronto. It is still riding high on the cartload of awards it has won since its debut at the Montreal Fringe Festival last June.

"Hip-hop culture is an east coast, New York-based urban expression movement," says Batalion. "It involves rapping or rhyming to beats, breakdancing, graffiti art and deejaying or 'scratching' that involves pushing a vinyl record back and forth under a turntable needle to produce sounds."

The Montreal actors have been collaborating since high school on publicly staged theatre projects. With an instinct for what's fresh and timely, they relish turning tradition on its ear.

This is what evokes the initial chuckle, before the barrage of lyrics that critics have called "can't-stop-laughing funny" and "endlessly inventive."

A sample: "E-N-V-E-L-O-P-E, got it in the mail. Now, what could it be? Letter of promotion for all of my devotion, to Hoover I'm a mover, shaker, putting things in motion..."

Sadly for Job, the Devil sits upstage, typing the very letter he's about to open and it's not the good news Job expects.

In the updated story, God is J. Hoover (slurred, the name sounds like Jehovah), the all-powerful president of a hip-hop record label. Lucifer is Lou Saphire, the company's vice-president of finance who prompts the boss to test employee Job Lowe's (read as Joe Blow's) loyalty by removing his work benefits and, eventually, his job.

Eli Batalion (left) and Jerome Saibil bring a new beat to Job: The Hip-Hop Musical, at the Tarragon Extra Space in Toronto.

The story isn't allowed to slip into the comfort zone of familiarity but engages in some philosophical and theological debate.

In addition to all the other roles, the partners play two narrators holding opposing views. MC Abel (Batalion) feels that humanity has to have blind faith and accept "what the powers-that-be deal you, since there must be a reason for it." MC Cain (Saibil) feels that the story exposes an egotistical, irritable God who toys with an innocent man, thus demonstrating that human suffering is without reason.

"Their arguments are based on real rabbinic and scholarly debates," they say, topics they studied as students at Bialik High School in Montreal.

The partners are taking their celebrity in stride. They are creative dervishes. Since the age of 19 and their first Fringe play, they have presented a number of successful touring productions, including Everything You Wanted to Know About Yourself But Were Afraid to Ask Freud, which was launched at their alma mater, Brown University in Rhode Island, where they earned degrees in philosophy and psychology.

Real rabbinic debates

Saibil and Batalion line up all their bookings themselves. They write, direct, light and perform Job solo, although they asked American DJ Paul Bercovitch for help with the "scratching" for the 10-tune soundtrack to which they rap.

Both 22, Saibil and Batalion look forward to branching out into film, TV and radio. These young actors will not be content to sit under their fig tree. They already have plans for a sequel to Job.

Swan Lake dancer has a passion for ballet

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

When Avinoam Silverman speaks, his fingers dance in the air. It looks like his passion for ballet and the articulating hands are linked physically, and that need to move is a testament to the dancer's excitable personality.

The 25-year-old Jerusalem native has been fulfilling his personal wish-list by dancing with the National Ballet of Canada. A member of the corps de ballet since 1997, Silverman will be featured in James Kudelka's Swan Lake, opening at Toronto's Hummingbird Centre on Feb. 14 and running until Mar. 2.

The role of Benno — Prince Siegried's friend — is familiar to Silverman, since he played Benno in the 1999 Swan Lake. In fact, performing on stage in front of thousands has never fazed the young ballet star, who has danced in more than 20 productions with the National Ballet.

"Performing is a great reward," he says, "and if I can move the audience emotionally, then I feel good about my performance."

Silverman first felt that glimmer of satisfaction in a Jerusalem dance school where he was intrigued by the refined technique of ballet. But as the only boy, he was often ridiculed by the girls in the class and his confidence ebbed.

He moved to Toronto after Grade 10 to continue his studies at the National Ballet School. Silverman admits the move changed his outlook on fitting into a dance school because classes were now co-ed.

"While it was difficult because I was away from my family," he says, "the house parents and counselling services were so helpful."

Silverman adds that dance teachers at NBS improved his dancing technique by, for example, teaching him to relax his ribs so his neck wouldn't tighten during a strenuous move.

He says the ballet system is ruled by certain standards that require a strong and disciplined body. However, Silverman also believes dancers face mental struggles in this highly competitive field. Stress and injuries can debilitate an amateur's focus, and Silverman is no stranger to both.

CELEBRATING JAMES JOYCE ON BLOOMDAY

Next to St. Patrick, Ireland's most famous legendary figure is undoubtedly Leopold Bloom, the Jewish Dubliner who is the hero of James Joyce's epic novel Ulysses.

The story takes place on a single day, June 16, 1904, and for many years that famous day has been celebrated by Joyceans around the world with readings and walks, songs and talks.

Toronto has had an officially sponsored public BloomDay celebration for 20 years. For the centenary, Wed. June 16, 2004, a committee has been formed to make the event a great success.

A BloomDay ceilidh, walk on the beach, Irish pub lunch, lectures and musical events are being planned, as is a virtual tour of Jewish Dublin. Sponsors are being sought for each event.

The committee invites interested persons to come forward with ideas and energy to help make this a memorable event. Contact Ralph Wintrob, 416-781-1214.

TRAVEL TALK

VOLUNTEERS WANTED FOR ARCHEOLOGICAL DIGS

Israel is inviting curious and adventurous volunteers to help uncover the country's historic mysteries at 12 archeological digs this summer.

Although required qualifications vary for each project, previous experience is not generally necessary. Volunteers pay their own way to Israel, plus room and board. However, because the workday begins at dawn and ends in early afternoon, there's ample time for recreation and touring, which is often part of the project package.

The archeological expeditions are spread across Israel, but here's a sampling of three fascinating sites:

•Sha'ar Hagolan – Just south of the Sea of Galilee, this is the largest pre-historic art centre in Israel. Over 150 objects, some dating back 8,000 years, have been discovered at the site of this ancient village. The archeological season here begins June 15.

•Bethsaida – Also in the Galilee region, Bethsaida is a noted Christian site associated with Jesus. Archeologists did not discover the site until 1987. Summer digs begin May 12.

• Tel Assawir – No one knows for sure which ancient city is buried at this mysterious site, located about 13 km east of Caesarea on the Mediterranean coast. Preliminary work has already uncovered pottery, figurines and other artefacts. The digging begins July 27.

Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs offers a complete listing of available archeological expeditions at www.israel-mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH00wk0

Mountaineering in Alaska: Teva Adventure, a Jerusalem-based not-for-profit organization that provides outdoor and wilderness programs to the world-wide Jewish community, is offering Introduction to Mountaineering in Alaska in conjunction with the National Outdoor Leadership School.

Scheduled for this summer, the program features numerous sessions for teens, college students, young adults, and adults. Group size is between 8 and 12 participants per session.

Teva's goal is "to provide Jews from all backgrounds with an exciting, personal and powerful experience which allows them to learn outdoor and leadership skills while forging a bond with the outdoors and each other," said founder Yael Ukeles.

The program offers a Jewish approach to wilderness travel, kosher food and a traditional Shabbat. For details, visit the web site www.tevaadventure.org. Email, press@tevaadventure.org. Phone +972 54 603 156.

Israel Notes

• The Sea of Galilee's water level rose last week by about 15 cm. That's good news in a region where water is a precious resource. Rivers in the entire Galilee district and the northern Jordan River are full as well.

•In 2002, Israel welcomed 26,000 Canadian tourists, a drop of 25 per cent over 2001. Despite the overall decrease, the number of Jewish visitors rose from 16,500 in 2001 to 18,500 in 2002. Roughly three-quarters of all Canadians visiting Israel last year were Jewish.

Swan Lake dancer articulates feelings

A torn ACL, in the knee area, knocked him out of practice for nine months, but since last year's surgery he has continued to rehabilitate by strengthening his quadriceps and lower body. In a rehearsal at the Walter Carson Centre in Toronto, Silverman's injury barely slows his energy, as his elegant leaps and broad smiles garner an approving nod from the instructor, Karen Kain.

Working under the tutelage of ballet legends such as Kain and Rex Harrington is nothing new to the young dancer.

"I see them all the time," he says. The people Silverman would like to see most, though, is his family in Jerusalem.

"I feel helpless here," he admits. "When I hear about something horrible happening in Israel, I have to focus on ballet." He pauses. "But that pain, that conflict I feel, is often expressed in my choreography."

Like a rising actor taking the director's chair, Silverman has been interested in choreographing dance sequences. He recently staged a dance duet at Toronto's It Nightclub for an arts show. The movements reflected his frustration of the distance between him and his homeland. At one dramatic moment, Silverman opens his mouth with his fingers, signifying his helplessness as a transplanted Israeli.

While Silverman maintains that ballet movements don't allow much room for creative expression, emotional range can diversify performances. As in theatre, dancers can articulate feelings of rage or sadness, for example, through their facial expressions.

One of Silverman's career highlights includes playing Mercutio in Romeo and Juliet, which toured western Canada. In a death scene, he was able to explore his dramatic depths, for which he received positive feedback.

In Swan Lake, Silverman expects to be several notches above his previous Benno performance. He says he is more attentive to his body and has improved his technical moves. And to better understand the complexity of ballet pieces, Silverman appreciates the music behind the dancing.

"Classical music is so layered," he says. "I love to see movements in my head as the music plays" — and here his long fingers pirouette — "and then do them physically."

Swan Lake is playing at the Hummingbird Centre for the Performing Arts from Feb. 14 to Mar. 2, and ticket prices range from $30 to $114. For information, call 416-345-9595.

Older job seekers suffer discrimination: McMaster scholar

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Older adults looking for work often feel they are the victims of subtle age discrimination, according to research conducted by Ellie Berger, a doctoral candidate at McMaster University's department of sociology.

This feeling, Berger says, affects their sense of identity.

"It's a cycle – discrimination leads to a loss of self and depression, which leads to a search for ways to overcomethis discrimination," she said in an interview.

They develop strategies, such as dying their hair to look younger, taking out the graduation year on their resumé, using what they consider youthful language and engaging in what they see as more youthful activities, she said.

Some find support groups or government programs to help them cope with their feelings and the fact of getting older.

"You have to realize that the government considers those over 45 as 'older job-seekers,'" Berger said.

Others turn the experience around to something positive, she said, finding more time to spend with their family, or adopting a healthier lifestyle and exercising more.

"Of course, some just have more time to be couch potatoes," she added.

What the participants in the study considered "subtle discrimination" was being told that they were overqualified for the position and that the company was looking for more junior employees; recruiting agencies saying that their clients were looking for someone younger while offering no proof; not being called back after a first interview; or ads calling for only five years' experience and offering a low wage.

Berger interviewed 30 individuals between the ages of 45 and 65 who had been unemployed for three months or longer, and were actively searching for work. She said the low number of research subjects was due to the fact that each one was interviewed in depth, and that her study was not intended to give statistical information. She mentioned an earlier study of some 600 employers that had studied the attitudes of employers across Canada.

But Berger said she also wanted to find out if the age of the employers had any connection to their actions toward older workers. She sensed "something hidden" in the employers' attitudes.

"When they were discussing technological advances, for instance, they were very positive when discussing workers on their staff, but negative when talking about hiring new staff," she said.

Berger said her studies will form the basis of her doctoral thesis, which she is writing while also teaching a course in gerontology at Ryerson University.

Elderly need more vitamin D: study

The elderly need more vitamin D than younger people do, according to Mount Sinai Hospital researchers Paul Walfish and Reinhold Veith in Toronto.

In a report published recently in the Journal of Clinical Endrocrinology and Metabolism, Walfish, a specialist in endocrinology, and Veith, a biochemist and medical researcher, explained that the increased vitamin D is needed to compensate for the decline in kidney function that comes with aging.

Poor kidney function, said Walfish, leads to higher levels of parathyroid hormone, the hormone that signals the bones to release the proper amounts of calcium into the bloodstream. The increase causes the bones to release more calcium into the blood.

Their most recent research showed that to keep the parathyroid hormone at healthy levels, "older people need higher blood levels of vitamin D, and more vitamin D intake than younger people do," Vieth said in a media release.

Vitamin D is absorbed into the skin from the sun. This does not happen as much in northern regions such as Canada, because there is very little sunshine for long periods of the year and people keep their skin covered. The vitamin is also available in fortified milk, fatty fish and fish oils.

Walfish and Vieth note that while national guidelines in both Canada and the United States advise adults to take at least 600 international units (IU) of vitamin D per day, all multivitamins marketed in Canada, even those formulated for the elderly, contain only 400 IU.

The Scientific Advisory Council of the Osteoporosis Society of Canada recommends 800 IU, and German researchers have found that this increased dosage improves blood pressure and balance in the elderly. The European Commission's scientific committee on food recently increased what it considers a safe dosage for vitamin D intake, based largely on research done by Vieth and others in Toronto.

A roving cowboy and a Russian doll

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

If you were a real "folkie" in the 1960s, you would have heard of Ramblin' Jack Elliott. The protégé of Woody Guthrie and friend of Bob Dylan has been described as the link between these two folk music giants.

Ramblin' Jack, whose father was a Jewish doctor, ran away from his home in Brooklyn at the age of 15 to join the rodeo. He spent years travelling the back roads of America, learning the cowboy songs and folk melodies of the country. At one point, he went to England and became a big hit there. When he returned to the United States, he quickly became a part of the folk music revolution of the 1950s and 1960s.

Ramblin' Jack performed with some of the great icons of American music. He was part of Bob Dylan's Rolling Thunder show for a time and appeared with such artists as Johnny Cash and Pete Seeger. And he learned a lot of his music sitting at Guthrie's knee.

A few years ago, Ramblin' Jack's daughter, Aiyana, decided to make a film documenting her father's story. Having spent little time with him while growing up, she had a lot of questions. So they hit the road and she began shooting the film The Ballad of Ramblin' Jack.

Aiyana started out with the intention of telling the story of a young boy from who felt an urge to leave home and wander across the country. But instead of a story about a roving cowboy, the film turned into a daughter's search for her father.

The documentary includes interviews with Elliott's family, archival material and concert performances, as well as home movies from the Guthrie family's private collection.

The Ballad of Ramblin' Jack is a fascinating look at a unique individual and how he was shaped by the American dream and American music.

It has been available on video in the United States for a few years, but is finally available on VHS and DVD in Canada, although it may be difficult to find. I obtained a copy only after placing a special order through a local video store.

Russian Doll is a film about a Jewish girl from St. Petersburg, Russia, who arrives in Sydney, Australia, to meet a husband arranged through an international matchmaking service. No one meets her at the airport so she goes to her prospective groom's apartment, where she finds him dead in his easy chair.

Thus begin Katia's adventures in her new homeland. Not knowing what to do, she goes out into the street and gets picked up by a well-to-do married businessman named Ethan. The two quickly enter into a passionate affair.

But Katia can't remain in Australia too long unless she gets married. So he arranges a marriage of convenience with his best friend Harvey.

It's a perfect plan, except that Harvey and Katia actually fall in love. The story is somewhat farfetched, but Natalia Novikova is absolutely charming as the immigrant girl who insists on a strictly Jewish wedding.

Both these videos have been released in Canada by Alliance Atlantis Home Video.

Artist uses fabrics to add a three-dimensional touch

By JORDAN PRESS
Special to The CJN

Judy Singer, wrapped in a turquoise shawl with a pattern of gold branches and leaves, stands at the entrance of the Moore Gallery smiling and signing autographs at the opening of her new show of sculptural paintings.

Hanging next to her is a portrait of Joyce Welland done by Canadian artist Gordon Rayner . Welland – a Canadian who made art history by using textiles in her works – looks similar to Singer, but it's Singer who has remade herself in her new work by using textiles.

"It's not only about the [message]," Singer says. "It's about the materials you use – the medium – and using the medium to express an idea."

Singer's new exhibition, which runs until Feb. 22, uses scraps of fabrics and clothing to add a three-dimensional touch to her canvas. Her works express feminine themes and imagery surrounding weddings. The medium is different, but Singer manipulates it well, says gallery owner Ron Moore.

"She has wonderful sensibilities of the materials she's using," he says. "[Her work] has a very beautiful, feminine quality about it that's appealing."

A top Jewish Canadian artist, Singer has had exhibitions in Toronto, Edmonton, Ottawa, Montreal and Pittsburgh, where her work was seen at the Carnegie International– an exhibition of the top artists in the world. Some of her donated paintings hang in the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care and the Adath Israel Synagogue; others have been given to charities including the Art Against AIDS gala in Chicago.

Using the medium to express an idea

This isn't the first time Singer has re-invented herself. Most artists paint left to right, but after a trip to Israel in 1978, Singer began painting from right to left – like written Hebrew. She says it changes the energy and orientation of her art, and she finds that exciting. In 1990, she created paintings inspired by Jewish scriptures. Singer used religious passages as inspiration and turned them into abstract art. She feels her Jewish art appeals to everyone.

"[The painting] is just an illustration of an idea if it only talks to a certain amount of people," she says, "but, if you go beyond that then it becomes universal."

During the recession of the early '90s, Singer had to find new sources of income, and she started selling home-baked pies. Soon, her pies were in demand at fine food stores and restaurants. In 1992, Judy's Country Tarts moved into a 5,000-square-foot factory and in 1999 took a first prize in the New Kosher Products competition. She gave it all up to go back to painting full time.

Singer and her friend and mentor, art critic Ken Carpenter, agree the 10 years off of painting full time hurt her career.

But, Carpenter adds, "she's re-invented herself several times and surprised me each time. It's reminded me that the best artists don't stay in a mould all that long."

Although her art changes, her work day doesn't. She goes into her studio at the rear of her house just after noon and stays until four o'clock. She has to be alone – even the breathing of another person may throw her off, she says. With her back to the windows facing west, she puts on some Chopin and paints with brushes, her hands and sponges. This is where Singer paints her inner landscape and creates life on canvas.

Making a living out of painting is hard. For every sold painting, the gallery takes 50 per cent commission. Artists use what's left to pay for materials (canvases, paints, brushes, frames), invitations, media releases and advertisements. One painting sells at Singer's opening for $2,500 – "and that's a bargain," she says laughing.

Singer's laugh rises over the cacophony of conversations. Amid a forest of people, Singer stands out with her turquoise shawl.

"That's why I bought this [shawl]," she says. "I want to blend in with the art."

For information about the exhibit, call the gallery at 416-504-3914.

Hockey goalie inspired by Hayley Wickenheiser

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

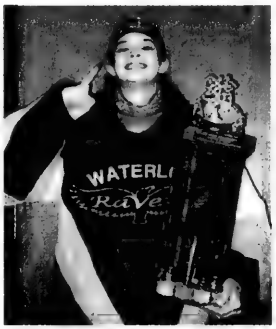
WATERLOO, Ont. — During a house league practice in a Waterloo hockey rink not too long ago, 13-year-old Chelsea Abel noticed a group of men playing at the other end of the ice. She was a goalie with two years of experience, and something caught her eye.

Abel saw that the men's slapshots were soft and hugged the ice. "I could stop that," she told her father.

She approached the guys and asked one sitting on the bench if she could play. Although the answer was yes, when another skated by and rolled his eyes, Abel had a change of heart, and told her father she didn't want to play after all. Some people, she realized, still can't accept the fact a young girl can play hockey with the big boys.

But Abel has already been playing with boys and girls, stopping pucks and talking hockey for some time.

"I love the spotlight of making a nice save," says Abel, who plays goalie for the Waterloo Ravens, a bantam rep hockey team in the Southwestern Ontario Girls Hockey League.



We're number 1, goalie Chelsea Abel points out after the Ravens finished first in house league action.

So far this season, the team is appreciating her puck-stopping prowess. In her first 13 games, Abel sported a .924 save percentage and recorded three shutouts. Last year, in pee-wee rep, Abel had 12 shutouts in 43 games and the team finished first in its division.

Her passion for the ice began in Grade 4, when boys boasted of scoring goals and watching entire Maple Leafs games. It sounded like fun, so Abel joined a non-competitive house league as a defenceman. She became a goalie two years later and was picked by Waterloo rep coach Paul Whitney to play between the pipes for the Ravens. She says it was not only flattering that her coach chose her, it changed her life.

"I got nicer pads, for starters," she says. "And I got an amazing goalie coach who always tells me how to improve my game."

That determination to increase her on-ice skills pushes Abel to work on weak areas: playing the puck around the boards and perfecting her butterfly stance. She is particularly proud of her strengths, such as stopping shots with her glove hand, a skill that developed from years of summer baseball.

"I don't let many goals bother me," Abel says. "After all, as I'm told by my coach, it goes through five players before it gets to you."

Like a zealous fan, Abel picks up hockey wisdom wherever she can. In early November, she took part in the Esso School Program in Waterloo and afterward she attended the Four Nations Cup. Meeting Team Canada goalie Kim St. Pierre was one of the many highlights of that week.

"I wish I could sit down with her and talk more about women and hockey," she says.

Not surprisingly, Abel is encouraged by the example of Hayley Wickenheiser, a Canadian woman's team star who recently signed a pro contract with a men's team in the Finnish hockey league. She saw a TV clip of Wickenheiser exchanging high-fives with her new teammates and to Abel, it looked like "the men didn't care that she was playing with them."

That attitude seems to be catching. The boys on her school co-ed hockey team and even on her street also welcome the skill she brings. Some boys argue who will get Abel as their all-important puck-stopper.

"Some of my friends joke that I'm such a guy," she says, laughing, "and I admit I'm somewhat of a tomboy. But I want to go far with hockey and I want to do this for the rest of my life."

Whitney, Abel's coach on the Ravens, pictures the 13-year-old going far. When she first played, letting in a few goals would bother the rookie goalie, Whitney says. But he's noticed a "100 per cent turnaround" when her mental skills developed to blend with her physical prowess.

"Young goalies need to work on the mental part of the game," Whitney says, "and Chelsea has done an excellent job at that."

"I have to suck it up. It's like getting a bad mark on a test – I have to move on," says Abel, a straight-A student.

Opposing players shouldn't take Abel too lightly, though. When a player skated into her in a game recently, Abel gave the girl a whack on the shins to "show her what the consequence is." She says she is not proud of playing rough, but as any player knows, that's the way the puck drops.

Shouldn't we try everything?

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

It is almost impossible for me to expunge from my mind's eye the bloody images of a PLO terrorist attack on schoolchildren in Ma'alot in the early 1970s. I am also plagued by the memory of an Israeli mother accidentally smothering her child to death while they hid in a closet, as terrorists destroyed her home in Nahariya in 1978.

When I see Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, I imagine him bathed in the blood of these and other victims of terror. His leadership disgusts me, yet in spite of this, I am hopeful that peace will come to Israel and the Middle East.

I am hopeful, because I believe there are many courageous Jews and Arabs interested in pursuing peace, even at the risk of their own lives. I believe this grassroots movement will inspire more people to seek out and discover viable partners for peace in the Middle East.

One powerful example of this grassroots movement was a recent retreat held in Jerusalem that was sponsored by the Interfaith Encounter Association, a group headed by Yehuda Stolov, an Orthodox Jew. The retreat had the blessing of Nablus Mayor Ghassan al-Shakaa.

As reported in the Jerusalem Post last month, 20 Palestinians from Nablus, Ramallah, Hebron and Bethlehem joined 35 Israelis in Jerusalem by dodging curfews and checkpoints and "travelling at times on foot through muddy back lanes."

A Muslim Arab who participated in the retreat as a representative of the Nablus Youth Federation told the Post, "We took gigantic risks to be here [because]... we want Israelis to know that there are lots of Palestinians who support peace who you never see in the media."

Loai, a Palestinian from Ramallah said: "I can't wait for the next retreat, and I will try to bring more people with me. Other Palestinians will mock me and curse me, but I don't care."

Many Jews will read this and similarly mock those Jews who attended this retreat, saying, "Some Jews are so easily fooled. This is what the Arabs want – to cajole us until we are asleep with false hope."

Those who commit to such a belief might consider that it has generally been a few courageous people, often maligned by bystanders and frequently alienated from their communities, who have pioneered historically great movements and attempts at peace.

It takes enormous courage to meet with the "enemy" in wartime, especially if one does so with openness and a belief that he or she could in fact become a friend.

Am I naive? Perhaps, yet the more I investigate examples of healthy interaction between Jews and Arabs, the more I discover tiny pockets of people everywhere working toward this goal.

Another example is a recent evening called A Night of Engagement, the brainchild of two university students – James Sevitt and Avi Zer-Aviv. This hopeful evening, held in Toronto last week, facilitated interaction between Jews and Arabs living in the Greater Toronto Area, with a focus on discussion and true understanding.

Before a relationship can be changed, each side needs to see the other in a different light. As long as all Arabs define Jews as evil and as long as we continue to believe that every Arab is an enemy of Israel and the Jewish people, the suffering will continue unabated.

Arafat is not likely to bring peace. Is Ariel Sharon? I doubt it. But I would bet that the brave efforts of a few Jews and Arabs wading through muddy back roads to get to Jerusalem can accomplish something that will last for generations – the destruction of stereotypes and mythologies that have led to hatred and the death of too many Jewish and Arab family members.

Shouldn't we try everything?

BRIE & MANGO QUESADILLAS

3 tblsps. butter
1 mango, thinly sliced
1 small red onion, thinly sliced
1/3 - 1/2 lb. sliced Brie cheese
4 flour tortillas
cumin to taste
avocado for garnish
cilantro for garnish

Melt butter in a large skillet. Layer mango, red onion and Brie on one half of one side of each tortilla. Fold over tortilla. Sauté in pan until cheese is melted and tortilla is golden brown. Sprinkle outside of tortilla with cumin while browning. Garnish with avocado slices and cilantro. Cut tortilla into 4-6 slices. Serve warm. Yields 16-20 appetizer servings.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have to travel periodically for my job, and I'm usually sent to the United States for courses or meetings.

It's usually fairly obvious that I am the only Jewish person at most of these things, as my last name is a dead giveaway. Most of the time this is not an issue, but I do get the occasional person coming up to me during a break and saying such things as: "So, you are a Jewish person, I've never met one before." This happened to me last week and I was livid. I felt like strangling the uncouth jerk.

On my plane ride home, I couldn't get his reaction to me off my mind and wondered what other people might have done or said in the same situation. Is there anything I could have done to defuse the awkwardness of this meeting?

Odd Person Out

Dear Odd Person Out

First of all, please understand that never having met a Jew before does not automatically make this person an anti-Semite.

There are many situations when people feel awkward being singled out because of their background, such as a non-smoker in a room full of smokers, or a vegetarian in a room full of meat eaters. It could be anything.

The best defence is knowledge. Arm yourself with as much of it as you can. The more you know about your situation, the better equipped you are to teach others.

Broaden this person's horizons. Take your 15-minute break and teach him about who you are. Make sure that when he leaves that meeting, he has learned about you as a "Jewish person."

This doesn't mean you have to study Talmud. It just means you have to arm yourself with very basic knowledge about your heritage, community, current events, etc. Remember, all he knows is what he sees in the media. Think about the image he has developed.

Be likeable and informative and walk away with your head held high, knowing you've just enriched the life of another human being.

Examining important wellness issues

Health is not simply the absence of sickness.
– Hannah Green, American author (1927—1996)

Truer words were never spoken. Yet it was not always so. In the past, good health generally referred only to the absence of disease. Life was tougher, life spans were shorter, and when people referred to health, they meant medical concerns to be treated by a doctor.

Editorial

Today, if you asked a group of people what health means, you would probably find a range of opinion.

To a degree, health still means absence of sickness, of course. However, it also means much more. To maintain their health, people are turning to alternative forms of treatment, from acupuncture and hypnosis to yoga and meditation.

Furthermore, the public is no longer content to wait for the doctor to deliver the diagnosis: healthy or sick, fit or flabby. People are taking more control of their own health and fitness. Spas, fitness clubs and yoga classes have grown in recent years, and some people are seeking out weight managers and personal trainers. Others are setting up exercise equipment in their homes and changing their eating habits by choosing healthier foods.

With improved levels of fitness and health, people are living longer and new resources are needed to accommodate an increasing number of elderly people. This trend should continue for some time to come as the baby boomer generation ages. In the future, the need for home care, retirement homes, nursing homes and other forms of geriatric care will continue to expand.

The downside to the aging of the population undoubtedly will be an increase in the number of reports of seniors-related ailments and diseases such as Alzheimer's.

The CJN's first health supplement, To Your Health, examines some of these issues. Health is an area of great importance, for as it has often been said: "If you don't have your health, you have nothing."

Husband and wife with Alzheimer's cope together

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

James Harris eases into a cozy brown couch in his Downsview home. He glances out a glass sliding door that overlooks the snow-covered ravine beyond his backyard and crosses his legs. He is relaxed – finally.

Three days ago, James' wife Fay spent her first night in her new home – Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, the Jewish home for the aged.

"When she came to Baycrest the first day, she was welcomed by the nurses and all sorts of other people," says the 74-year-old past president of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda synagogue.

"She didn't say a word, but I could see her face light up with delight."

James' attitude has been a key to coping

Seeing a beaming smile on Fay's face hasn't been as common a sight as James would like since she was diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease five years ago.

Since then, much has changed for the Harris', not only because of Fay's deteriorating health, but also because James, too, has Alzheimer's.

Alzheimer's is a degenerative disease in which brain cells die over time. The disease is the leading cause of dementia, which results in loss of memory, judgment and reasoning, as well as changes in mood and behaviour.

Three of Fay's friends first noticed a change in her behaviour.

Initially, James didn't think much of it.

"Fay had a unique personality," James relates, his love for Fay evident in his proud smile.

"She was very happy. She was an excellent teacher."

James said he may have noticed the change as well, but simply accepted it.

After more urging from Fay's friends, James took Fay to the doctor.

Although it was first thought Fay had depression, a specialist correctly diagnosed Fay with Alzheimer's.

James' own diagnosis followed just months later.

Although he is seven years' his wife's senior, James has had a much different experience with the disease than Fay.

Fay's speech, memory and fine motor skills have declined markedly. After a fall at home, she spent three months in hospital recovering from a broken hip.

She requires assistance to dress and groom herself and doesn't remember the names of her son and daughter.

James, a retired chartered accountant, still drives, is an avid reader and bridge player and keeps his house in good order.

He says his memory isn't as sharp as it used to be and sometimes words don't reach the tip of his tongue. But for the most part, James is in great shape.

His good health has been extremely important in taking care of Fay. And more importantly, James' attitude has been a key to coping.

James Harris with his wife Fay.

"Little by little, [Fay] got worse and I had to adjust and accept it," James recalls.

"You have to understand that when they're doing things they shouldn't be doing, it's entirely due to the condition. You have to smile… and carry on as if things were normal."

James also managed to deal with Fay's condition by seeking out the support of professional caregivers.

Providers divided over home care recommendations

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Romanow report urges expanded coverage

Last December's Romanow report on the future of health care in Canada sheds new light on home health care, urging expanded coverage in three areas: mental health, post-acute and palliative care.

Some providers approve of the recommendations in the report, while others believe they don't go far enough. But all agree that major funding transfusions are needed for service changes to trickle down to those who need them most.

Susan VanderBent of the Ontario Home Health Care Providers' Association (OHHCPA), representing more than 30 Ontario agencies that care for more than 150,000 people, says her group was "100 per cent thrilled" with the report.

She applauds the its classification of home care as part of "the first-line care system" that also includes family doctors and community pharmacists, saying it will help "keep people at home and healthy."

But Terri Noy, manager of Baycrest Home Care Services, says the Romanow report doesn't adequately support seniors.

"It would accommodate seniors just home from hospital… [or] in a palliative situation," but many "go into a long-term care facility prematurely when they could function very well… with a little bit of government assistance. There was no recommendation… to increase assistance to these people."

Besides seniors, VanderBent says home care supports individuals with "lifelong illnesses or chronic disabilities, such as multiple sclerosis," as well as "moms and dads… caring for medically fragile children, with birth defects or congenital defects."

Most of these issues are overlooked in Romanow, she says, and "without a good home and community care system, people will go to [emergency rooms] for care they should be getting at home."

A comprehensive system, says VanderBent, would address "the stroke after-care that your grandmother requires, but [also] her need to stay independent in her home… We have to advocate for the whole person, not just the wound."

Roy Romanow

Baycrest Home Services provides a wide range of short- or long-term home care services, custom-tailored to seniors' level of independence, Noy says.

Baycrest's Lifeline service offers customizable reminders that "can be something like 'it's 2 o'clock; time to take your medication,'" says Noy, or, "if they have congestive heart failure, 'it's time to weigh yourself today,' because a weight gain would indicate a change in the condition." This kind of assistance lets seniors take responsibility for their own medical care.

Noy says families often believe a relative needs full-time care when this is often not the case.

"Children feel the guilt of not being able to be there, and assume 'If I have [care available] 24 hours, everything's going to be all right.'" This places a "stigma on the senior. It's like saying to them, [you] can't do this anymore."

In reality, she says, "often they just need a little bit of help."

The perception that home care means round-the-clock care has another effect.

"Paying for 24 hours would mean an enormous cost," Noy says. To save money, families hire unqualified attendants who are "not trained, not bonded, with no experience," says Noy. "But without proper training, the client could be hurt… the caregiver could be hurt." Caregivers should also be bonded and police-checked, she says.

If a family uses home care only for certain functions, such as bathing or meal preparation, "you're not paying an enormous cost out."

This also sends a message to the individual receiving care. "It's important… to maintain their dignity and their pride."

Noy believes the government must begin funding ongoing care. Meanwhile, "families are left to bear the burden of this cost personally, and that's not doing a service to our seniors."

VanderBent says home care is not fully covered by provincial health plans, leaving patients to make up the difference or do without, leading to other problems.

"Ontario is very generous compared to other provinces," she says, but "in the last 18 months we have seen a funding freeze in home care."

Since April 2001, she says, 115,000 Ontarians have lost care. "They may have had to go into a long-term care facility… or a hospital," she says. Without home care, many will "become more of a challenge to the health care system."

That system, she says, "takes care of the people who are perceived as the sickest," overlooking the fact that, without support, "the others could end up just as sick."

A joint statement of the OHHCPA and the Ontario Community Support Association (OCSA), representing all home care providers in Ontario, calls the Romanow report a "strong and promising first step." Both groups urge the federal government to improve access to home care for all people with long-term illnesses and disabilities.

Depression common among Alzheimer's caregivers

Along with the doctor, who prescribed the drug Aricept for James and Fay, a social worker, occupational therapist and eventually a live-in nurse were instrumental in providing care.

James also made use of the Kosher Meals on Wheels service, which provided full-course meals to the Harris' five times a week.

"I'm a bit picky about what I eat, but I give them [a grade of] 90 per cent for the food that we got," James says.

As Fay's condition worsened, James said his wife stopped reading the newspaper and would often fall asleep while watching television.

"She really needed something to keep her busy," James says.

So he enrolled Fay in different groups with other seniors.

It took some time to find the right fit, but once Fay found her niche, she was happier.

"Every time I asked her what she did today, she couldn't tell me," James says.

"But one time as I took her out of the car, she said, 'You know, they have really nice people in there.'"

James says Fay has responded to walks, especially in verdant areas such as the park. She also enjoys it when James reads to her. And three or four trips to the Stratford and Shaw festivals have also been somewhat therapeutic.

James Harris

"The last things we saw was My Fair Lady, and she loved it," James says.

In many respects, the Harris' seem to be beating the odds.

The Canadian Study of Health and Aging found that 40 per cent of people who care for someone that suffers from moderate dementia report symptoms of depression.

James has managed to stay happy and he believes it is a reflection of the time he has set aside for himself.

"My friends and my family have told me that I've got to look after myself," James says.

"I've done that by playing bridge and doing a lot of reading."

James misses Fay dearly and would have preferred that she still live at home with him. But he believes the decision for her to live at Baycreat is for the best.

And he will continue to keep his head high, as long as he can.

"I've got a tremendous desire to keep going, to live," James says.

"I enjoy life. I haven't given in."

Doulas offer support before, during and after childbirth

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

When Lisa Farun was pregnant with her first baby about one year ago, she wanted an alternative to the traditional hospital labour and delivery.

She also wanted someone to she could turn to during her pregnancy – someone who would "be there" for her and would support her decision to have her baby at home.

After some investigation, she turned to a doula, a woman trained to provide emotional, physical and educational support during pregnancy, childbirth and postpartum.

"It was a great decision. During childbirth, my doula was able to provide a different kind of support than my family offered. She was not as invested in my pain as she was in getting me through my pain."

Even for women who deliver in a hospital, Farun says, a doula can perform a definite role.

> 'Women keep in touch with us on a regular basis throughout their pregnancy, and we encourage them to call us after each doctor's visit'

"Partners don't always have the knowledge to make rational decisions, and hospital staff do not always explain all the options available. Doulas do not make decisions, they help women understand their options."

Tanya Bohbot, a mother of two and a certified doula who trained through Doulas of North America (DONA), says her training – she has been certified about two years – included a seven-week course, pre-natal classes at a hospital and an apprenticeship with Chaya Smukler, an experienced doula.

"A doula performs a complementary role to the doctor. Women keep in touch with us on a regular basis throughout their pregnancy, and we encourage them to call us after each doctor's visit," Bohbot says.

Bohbot, who used Smukler, a doula for more than 20 years, during her two pregnancies, says she helps women decide on their ideal birthing situation.

"We talk about such things as whether they want to have the baby at home, be massaged throughout the labour, listen to music throughout or nurse the baby right away."

Smukler, who has seven children and three grandchildren, says she spends much of her time teaching women about the birthing experience.

"I teach them that labour is a natural process and that they should allow their body to do what it needs to do. I also stress that each woman is unique, and any choice she makes is wonderful. There is no right or wrong decision."

Women usually call their doula when their water breaks, says Bohbot. "We join them at home and help them stay comfortable until it is time to go to hospital, if hospital is their choice.

"We walk around, give them a massage, help them settle in different positions – whatever makes them more comfortable. Everyone, family included, is a lot more calmer when a doula is present."

The labour nurses at the hospital love it when a doula is present, Smukler says.

"We concentrate on making the woman comfortable, and we give them the chance to concentrate on what they have to do. It's a partnership. We help a lot when the woman has to begin pushing. We help them draw from their strength and do their best."

At a home birth, Smukler says, a midwife joins the doula toward the end of the labour. "I've had women deliver in their own bed, or in water in a birthing tub."

Water is a healer, she says, and she encourages a lot of water use during labour, whether in the shower or in the whirlpool if a woman's water has not broken.

A doula stays after the birth to ensure the mother is comfortable, is able to nurse – doulas like to see women nursing about half an hour after the birth – and to offer various resources, Smukler says.

Bohbot says most doulas become "addicted" to what they do. "I thought about becoming a doula when I accompanied my friend to her birth about five years ago. I realized that it was something that I should be doing."

It's hard work being a doula, she says, and sometimes she can be away from home for up to 36 hours, "but I come away from each birth on a real high. Each one is a miracle."

Smukler says God is present when a person is born, when they get married, and when they die. "I feel exhilarated at a birth, because I feel the presence of God."

Hearing from the experts:
Marilyn Pike M.A., Hearing Solutions Audiologist

Hearing loss is a gradual process. By the time some of our clients decide they should have their hearing tested, they don't realize how much they've relied on facial expressions to make their way through a conversation. The funny thing is, when they experience the difference the right hearing aid makes, the statement on their face says more than words ever could.

A hearing loss can be accompanied by feelings of frustration and isolation. But at Hearing Solutions, you'll feel empowered. We involve you throughout the entire process of testing and hearing aid evaluation, to educate you about your choices. So when it comes time to choose a solution, your decision will be an informed one.

One of our Registered Dispensing Audiologists will perform a comprehensive hearing assessment, and explain your test results. You'll learn exactly what you can expect from a hearing aid, and how it will improve the way you hear and understand speech.

Then we'll walk you through your choices, the different styles and advanced technologies in hearing, and how they meet your personal lifestyle and budget.

We'll even provide a 30-day trial with your hearing instrument, so you can experience for yourself how a hearing aid can improve your day-to-day activities. Don't wait to start the conversation... call us today to schedule a free hearing test & comprehensive consultation.

Understanding root causes key to weight loss

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

The Zone. Pritikin. Weight Watchers. Jenny Craig. Atkins. Herbal Wraps. Hypnosis. The list of ways to lose weight seems endless, and there are, it seems, methods to suit everybody.

But if there are so many supposedly sure-fire ways to lose weight, why aren't we doing it? Why are there so many overweight and obese people around? And why do many people who do manage to lose weight gain it back so quickly?

According to the World Health Organization, people with a body mass index – your weight in kilograms divided by the square of your height in centimetres – of between 25 and 29 are considered overweight, while those with a BMI of more than 30 are considered obese.

Using that measure, a recent Canadian Heart Health Survey found that 44 per cent of men and 25 per cent of women are overweight, while 13 per cent of men and 14 per cent of women are obese.

What is perhaps of more concern is the increase in the combined number of overweight and obese children in Canada – from 15 per cent in 1981 to 24 per cent in 1998.

Lance Levy, a Toronto physician who specializes in the medical treatment of weight disorders, notes that studies have shown we consume fewer calories than 50 years ago, but because people are less active, they are not burning off the calories they once were.

"It's more complex than just using the car to go everywhere instead of walking. We use a clicker for the TV, and let our children play… Nintendo, rather than, say, sending them out to play in the snow."

As well, he said, we have lost the tools we once used to manage stress. "Fifty years ago, we would dissipate stress by chopping wood. Now we eat."

Many think that people are overweight because they are "too stupid to understand about dieting," Levy said, but overweight people "know what the right breakfast is. They just don't eat it."

The first step in a weight-management program is to analyze previous attempts that have failed, Levy said.

"We have to get to the root of the problem, why a person can't stick to diet and lifestyle changes. It's not a matter of willpower, stupidity or lack of motivation."

Obesity is not a disease – it's a symptom, he said.

It may be the result of a mood problem, such as depression; chronic tiredness, which causes a person to eat constantly to get energy; a gastro-intestinal problem; chronic pain, or poor impulse regulation, Levy said.

"Ninety per cent [of obese people] have two or more of those problems."

In a recent book, titled Conquering Obesity (Key Porter, 2002), Levy identifies several eating disorders, including bulimia nervosa, which is marked by episodes of binge eating and purges to get rid of the extra calories; binge eating disorder, characterized by compulsive overeating, but not purging; and eating to deal with emotions, such as anger or frustration.

If those problems are identified and dealt with using such therapies as medication or psychotherapy, then over six to 12 months, there will be a 15 per cent loss of body weight, he said.

"The level of physical activity will increase, and there will be less stroke, gout or death."

Most weight-loss programs, Levy said, actually assume that a participant will only follow the plan conscientiously for six to eight weeks. "That is not in sync with a person's physiology."

Some people have unrealistic notions about what losing weight will accomplish, thinking it will solve all their problems and life will be perfect, he said. When that doesn't happen, depression can set in, leading to the whole cycle beginning again.

Rob Sugar is a personal weight loss coach. Like Levy, he begins by analyzing what a person has already tried, and attempts to find out "their real motivation to lose weight. Is it health? Is it a self esteem issue?"

Only an individualized program can be effective, Sugar said, since everyone has different reasons for losing weight as well as different characteristics and personalities.

He uses a process called awareness mapping, which "helps [people] identify the source of their eating habits."

People want to be satisfied in the moment, Sugar said, and therefore do not choose the most sensible path.

Home exercise a popular way to work out

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

few months ago, my wife Sharron and I were faced with a fitness dilemma.

Our family membership in a fairly pricey sports club was about to expire, and we were wondering what to do next.

There was nothing particularly wrong with the club. It had recently been renovated and had installed banks of shiny new exercise machines. It offered exercise classes galore, everything from spinning to pilates to boxercise and everything in between. The place was full of TVs and piped-in music to keep you interested during often-tedious exercise routines. Of course, all this came at a premium price, but, generally, you got what you paid for.

That is, if we actually used the club. Too often we found ourselves unmotivated to make the trek to the club in the first place. It might have been too cold, too late, or we felt too uninterested to make the effort.

So, what to do?

Sharron came up with an idea: Why not purchase an exercise machine we both could use in our own home? Cost-wise, it certainly made sense. We calculated we could get at least one good-quality home exercise machine for the price of our family membership, and we figured that once it was in the house, we might actually work out more often that we had at the club.

Turns out, we figured right.

It's been only a few months, but we've found the elliptical rider in our basement has been a great boon to our health.

Stationed in front of the home entertainment centre, the rider has been used almost every day by at least one of us. With our own CDs, videos, TV shows and DVDs (Bruce Springsteen Live in New York City is a particularly motivating one for me), we find ourselves exercising more often and for longer periods than we did before.

And it's so convenient. As soon as you wake up, you're at the gym!

It's just as convenient in the evening. If you have a few minutes before dinner, you can get in at least a short workout before the meal bell rings.

"Tell them it helps you lose weight," said Sharron.

"How much have you lost?" I inquired foolishly.

"I'm not telling you how much weight I've lost!" she said, using a tone that implies I must be out of my mind to expect a straight answer.

Ryan Scott has seen it all before – couples looking for a piece of exercise equipment, not to mention women trying to find the best weight-reducing machine. He's been in the fitness equipment industry for five years and in the last two, he's noticed "a tremendous increase in home buys.

"People are dedicating a room to a home gym with a strength piece and one or two cardio machines," said Scott, the manager of Boomerang Home Fitness' Mississauga store.

Some are novices starting out on an exercise program, but many are people who have been working out at gyms for years and are looking for a change.

The number 1 concern for the latter is the traffic they encounter getting to and from the gym, which adds to the time they must set aside for a workout, Scott said.

Once they've invested a great deal of time just getting to the gym, they feel they have to stay for at least two hours. If they miss a workout, "the next day they pound themselves in the gym," spending as much as three hours making up for lost time.

Having a home gym makes it easier to include exercise in your schedule. Instead of three two- and three-hour sessions per week, you can spend half an hour at it five times a week, he said.

To add variety to the workout, many customers are adding a second or third piece of equipment to their home gyms, combining a cardio machine with a strength piece, he said.

Hoping to determine whether Sharron and I are leading or lagging indicators of trends in home exercise, I conducted a completely unscientific survey in the The CJN kitchen.

PAWS for your health

By VERA GILLMAN
CJN Staff

Attending to children's physical and psychological needs while they are in hospital is a responsibility that generally falls to physicians, nurses and family members. For longer-term child patients, school or some form of recreation is often within reach. But despite all attempts and good intentions, bringing "life-on-the-outside" into the hospital setting is a challenge. Often a hospital stay leaves a child flip-flopping between feelings of excessive stress and boredom.

What's sadly lacking in this environment is a positive, calming distraction: the family dog.

Enter Reggie and Buster, two of the nine members of an elite club at The Hospital for Sick Children's PAWs (Pets At Work) program.

Once a unit agrees that the pets can visit, and once the parents have signed a consent form for their child, the specially certified therapy dogs of PAWs – who are of all shapes, sizes and breeds – drop by to see sick patients.

Why do pet visits work? Research has shown that patting an animal can lower blood pressure. Animals love unconditionally and remain on your side. In difficult situations, their presence can change your perception of what's going on from a threat to a challenge.

What makes a good therapy dog? Aside from being friendly and confident, they must be comfortable and not exhibit aggression or fear when confronted by an array of people, machines, wheelchairs, loud noises and sudden movements. Dogs who don't discriminate between people by look or sound often make good candidates. Testing and certification for PAWs candidates is performed by the St. John's Ambulance Therapy Dog Unit.

Now that my husband Russ and I have grown children who are away at school, we keep busy after work with our two canine kids, Reggie 8, and Buster, 6. Like other dogs, these two go on daily walks, chase squirrels, meet and play with doggie pals and love to eat treats or occasionally even garbage.

But unlike most of their canine companions, these dogs are also gainfully employed.

Every Tuesday evening, after a quick dinner and short walk, they spruce up, don their work apparel and are driven downtown to the hospital to start their rounds. First stop is the volunteer lounge where they pick up their tools of the trade, a camera for the kids who want a picture of themselves with their furry bedfellows, doggie stickers and of course, a dog cookie or two, a reward for their efforts.

Then the therapy begins. The therapists are the dogs; the recipients are teenagers with eating disorders, toddlers recuperating from surgery, children on the cardiac ward, young patients, parents and siblings living at Ronald McDonald House while they wait for test results, and doctors, nurses and other caregivers. Every one of them craves a diversion from an all-consuming reality. That's the nature of the therapy these caring comrades provide.

For some children, these dogs are surrogates for their own dogs at home. Others who have no experience with dogs often find a welcome substitute to their human charges. They engage in one-way conversations with these non-judgmental and loyal listeners. While some bury their hands or faces into their warm, soft fleece-like fur, others just stare wide-eyed at the photo ID cards that all PAWs dogs wear as official hospital personnel. In all cases, a little bit of the burden is eased, if only temporarily.

The working dogs' remuneration, cookies aside, is loads of love. They get attention, hugs, kisses, pats, squeals, whispers, gasps, giggles and piles of smiles.

As for Russ and me, we rush home from work, race downtown and become nameless and invisible as we escort our superheroes from patient to patient.

But we also get to spend a precious few hours with our fur family as we witness and revel in the joy that sharing their love brings. We come away from the hospital every week realizing how lucky we are and how rewarding it is to be able do something so small that elicits such a monumental reaction.

The laughter these canine clowns fetch is truly some of the best medicine.

Home exercise an alternative to fitness clubs

Ella Burakowski, our "Ask Ella" columnist, is another ex-gym club denizen. For the last few years, she's been exercising at home on a variety of machines.

"The problem with clubs is because I can only get to the clubs really early in the morning, by the time I worked out, took a shower and arrived at work, I had to get up at 5 a.m." she said. "At night, the club was packed, you had to wait in line for a machine and you had to wait in line to take a shower."

What's more, she often found she forgot to bring articles of clothing to the club. And, she said, there was also an intimidation factor, lining up to use the same machines as the hard-bodied athletes who were in tremendous shape.

Another *CJN*er, ad salesperson Bev Bergman, was also a member of a sports club, this one in a shopping mall. Besides getting bored with the same old routine, she found another downside.

Whenever she went with her teenage daughter, a shopping expedition to the mall inevitably ensued.

"I could never escape without buying something," Bergman said.

Reporter Carolyn Blackman pointed out that socializing at gyms can easily distract you from your workout.

In its 2001 Physical Activity Monitor, the Canadian Fitness and Lifestyle Research Institute (CFLRI) reported that home exercise was the third most popular activity among adults. And the 1998/99 National Population Health Survey found that 29 per cent of respondents said they exercised at home. Sixty-nine per cent said they walked for exercise, while 48 per cent said they did gardening and yard work (another form of home exercise). Other activities, such as swimming (24 per cent), bicycling (24 per cent), social dancing (22 per cent), golf (13 per cent) all ranked much higher than exercise classes and aerobics (7 per cent). (The figures exceed 100 per cent because respondents engaged in multiple activities.)

Citing the Complete Home Fitness Handbook by Edmund Burke, director of the exercise science program at the University of Colorado, the CFLRI notes that "many find home workouts easier to fit into their hectic schedules."

Among Burke's other findings: working out at home means people don't have to go out to a gym; they don't have to stand in line for a machine; they don't have to go outside in cold or storms; they won't be self-conscious about their appearance; they can have clean equipment that only they use; they are not bombarded with loud music they don't like; and they have the flexibility to exercise when they want, without arranging babysitting or juggling schedules.

Understanding weight loss

"There is a relationship between food, comfort and love," Sugar said, which is why so many people look for comfort, relaxation or stress relief in an "instant feel-good – like chocolate cake."

One of the reasons that people resist help with weight loss, Sugar said, is that they remember their parents nagging them about eating.

"When kids become old enough to control their own food intake, they behave like a rebel. 'I shouldn't eat that' sounds like mother nagging. Then they feel guilt after eating what they know they shouldn't. It's all a head game."

He identifies five reasons people overeat: for comfort, as a reward, as a distraction, for the freedom of doing what they are not supposed to do, and for stress relief.

The only way to lose weight is to use up more calories than you take in. Most of us know this, but the secret is to understand why we can't translate that knowledge into action.

POSITIVE CHANGES? A

LOST WEIGHT ...

Lisa Bliss of Burlington BEFORE hypnosis

My name is Lisa Bliss. I am a registered nurse. I dropped 30 pounds in eight short months and kept it off for over two years! I'd like to share my remarkable success story with you.

I thought dieting was my only way out! I tried diet pills from the health food store. I tried Weight Watchers and frozen, low-calorie foods. But I never stuck to anything long enough to have results. These "quick-fix" diets were not something I could live with long term.

Luckily, I learned about Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres through my friend and business partner. I thought it was a very different approach to weight loss, but it made a lot of sense. Not having to rely on my will power appealed to me.

Hypnosis is Different!

I love my hypnotic sessions. I am so deeply relaxed that all worries, cares or concerns seem to melt away. I can tune out the world and focus on myself for a while. And the life changes I've made while in that relaxed place are nothing short of miraculous!

I noticed a change in my behaviour my first week. I was drinking more water and didn't want to snack between meals. During those first seven days, I easily lost 4 pounds. I dropped my entire 30 lbs. without any effort whatsoever!

Call Immediately!

There is no dollar amount I can put on the benefits I have gained from the Positive Changes program. How much is one's health and happiness worth?

I emphatically recommend Positive Changes to anyone who wants to lose weight! This program has been a highlight in my life. There is no way I would have the health and happiness I enjoy today had it not been for Positive Changes. All of the great changes in my life filter back to hypnosis and the Positive Changes program.

... STOPPED SMOKING

I started smoking about two years ago. I have tried to quit cold turkey but it only lasted about three months and then I was smoking again. I wanted to quit smoking to feel better about my life and improve my Martial Arts.

I have now quit smoking through Positive Changes Hypnosis. I can be around other smokers and I feel no desire to start smoking again. I don't even think about having a cigarette now.

After quitting smoking, I am more optimistic and have a strong belief in the power of the mind.

I have recommended Positive Changes Hypnosis to all friends who smoke.

I don't think I will ever smoke again."

— Vlad Porembschi, Student, North York

20-year smoker quits after first session!

I had been a smoker for nearly twenty years. I could not remember what life was like as a non-smoker. It was difficult to picture myself as a non-smoker. But, I could feel it taking a toll on my health. I tried to quit several times, using different methods, with no success. I actually ended up smoking more with each failed attempt.

I went in for my first session as a pack-a-day smoker, and left never wanting to light another cigarette. As of that day, I've been able to sit with friends who smoke, with no desire and no craving for a cigarette. I can watch them light up, I can smell the tobacco. And, I can watch them inhale.

In all instances, I have forgotten about smoking and all of the cues that would bring about this habit. Since then, I am feeling much healthier. Not only have I quit smoking, I have forgotten about it. Further, I have been eating healthier and exercising regularly. I have actually lost weight. I am convinced that I will never smoke again. Thanks Positive Changes Hypnosis."

— John Tzelardoni, Business Owner, North York

From 4 packs a day to zero . . . in two short weeks!

I started smoking when I was 10 years old and had been smoking for 54 years....I've now been a non-smoker for one year thanks to Positive Changes Hypnosis. For years, I smoked 4 packs a day....constant coughing....I couldn't keep my breath at all.

I had tried the gum, Zyban, laser treatment and of course, cold turkey. Nothing worked except hypnosis. In a week, I was down to 3 cigarettes a day and after two weeks I didn't want to smoke at all.

When I started the sessions, what I noticed first was the relaxation....I don't think I ever relaxed in my life before coming to Positive Changes.

Quitting smoking was easier than I ever thought it could be....I don't think about cigarettes anymore and the relaxation is a big part of my life now."

Why hypnosis succeeds where other methods fail

Hypnosis, largely misunderstood, has suffered from an image problem since its earliest days. Rarely do people think of hypnosis as a healing tool. Most of us relate hypnosis to the comedic stage hypnotist who puts audience members into a trance and commands them to dance, sing, or behave like farm animals.

"That's strictly entertainment," says Dr. Patrick Porter, Executive Director of Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres and author of the best-selling book, Awaken The Genius. "There are so many misconceptions," he says. "Many people believe that hypnosis is a coma-like state. Not true. You aren't asleep and you will remember what happens."

Many of us confuse suggestibility with gullibility. We fear that we will be brainwashed or made to do something against our will. But the truth is, says Porter, "The hypnotized subject can hear everything that is being said and will always maintain control."

Hypnosis, as practiced by the certified professionals at Positive Changes, is meant to empower the subject. Although the American Medical Association recognized the effectiveness of hypnosis back in 1958, until now, a consistent standard of practice has been lacking.

That's why the success of Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres is real news. Dr. Porter noted that, "The use of hypnosis for weight loss, kicking the smoking habit, and other stress-related maladies, has gained momentum in recent years. More and more people are turning to alternative and holistic treatments."

Porter's point is well taken. There are so many methods for losing weight and a variety of contradictory diet plans. High protein, carbohydrate, low-fat, no-fat, grapefruit...the list goes on. Some methods can pose serious health consequences. Labels on diet drugs list many possible — often dangerous — side effects. The latest fad diets often cheat your body of its nutritional needs. Even some of the so-called "natural" herbal cocktails can have harmful side effects on some people. The major drawback to these methods is that none of them teach you to change the habits that caused you to put on the weight in the first place.

"The use of hypnosis for weight loss, kicking the smoking habit, and other stress-related maladies, has gained momentum in recent years. More and more people are turning to alternative and holistic treatments."
Dr. Patrick Porter, Ph.D

Success at losing weight and keeping it off is what Positive Changes Hypnosis is all about. Positive Changes has helped its clients lose weight and keep it off for good, all without popping a single pill, weighing food, or depriving themselves of the food they enjoy. "We help our clients to think and eat like naturally thin people do."

Positive Changes Hypnosis offers a free consultation with a view to helping clients lose weight, stop smoking, stop drinking, relieve stress, deal with anxiety or depression, accelerate learning, improve athletic performance, and deal with other behavioural issues. During this evaluation, you'll be tested to determine whether or not you're a candidate for hypnosis. If you are, the consultant will identify your goals and lay out a personalized program to achieve them.

Each hypnotic session is tailored to the individual. Porter explains, "With hypnosis we can program correct eating habits into the subconscious, which is where habitual behaviour comes from. This is why our clients report new behaviours that feel easy and natural upon awakening."

Kick your bad habits with hypnosis

By STACEY STEIN
Special to The CJN

Maureen McCabe had tried just about every diet program in Toronto, but none were successful in helping her kick her poor eating habits. McCabe also suffered from high levels of stress, which led to her bad eating habits – at one point, she was consuming up to five chocolate bars a day. Seeking a solution to her problem, she tried the stress program at Positive Changes Hypnosis, a franchise with over 100 hypnosis centres in North America, including 24 in Canada. She was impressed with the results.

"Once I did the program, there was an immediate change in me," McCabe said. "My friends and co-workers couldn't believe the difference in how relaxed I became. I lost 30 pounds from the stress program without doing the weight-loss program."

The former IBM senior manager, who had always dreamed of owning a small business, was so satisfied with the program that she decided to buy a franchise. After 18 years at IBM, she left her job and bought the North York Positive Changes franchise last August, which she manages with her sister Margot Thoms, who works at the centre part-time.

"My habits changed and stayed with me," said McCabe. "With all the stress of a new business, I've never been so relaxed and happy in my life."

Most use program to lose weight or quit smoking

The majority of Positive Changes' clientele use the hypnosis programs to lose weight or quit smoking. Most clients have already tried other programs to combat their problems, but to no avail.

"People usually come to us because they've exhausted everything," said McCabe, adding that with hypnosis, the results are permanent because the programs aim to change peoples' habits.

"When you have good habits, the results are long-lasting," she said.

Positive Changes Hypnosis was established in 1961 and moved to a franchise model in 1987. The company offers programs to help people lose weight, quit smoking, overcome their fears and phobias, improve their memory and break nervous habits. Programs can also be catered to the client's specific needs. McCabe recalled one client who was a pack rat and underwent hypnosis to become more organized.

The programs consist of one-hour sessions, during which clients explain the habits they want to change and then undergo hypnosis with a professionally trained hypnotist. The number of sessions varies depending upon the client, although McCabe said most of her clients attend two sessions per week. Clients also receive tapes of the sessions, which they are encouraged to listen to frequently.

"The idea is that the habits are made and changed at the subconscious level," said McCabe. "We make decisions with our conscious mind, but the subconscious mind controls the habits. While the subconscious becomes more aware, the messages enter the subconscious state."

According to McCabe, Positive Changes' success rate is over 85 per cent. She said the only people who are unsuccessful are those who drop out.

"Any poor behaviour or bad habit can be unlearned through hypnosis," said McCabe. "The key thing is you have to have the desire to make the change."

For a free consultation, contact McCabe at the North York centre at 416-913-7777.

Comment

At this time of year, with so many people sick with the flu, getting a flu shot is one defence, but keeping your sense of humour, laughing daily and taking time to "smell the roses" is just as important.

Humour improves moods, boosts immune systems, lowers blood pressure and speeds recovery time. It can be used as a way to soothe, defer and alleviate symptoms. Jokes, smiles and laughter are never more effective and appreciated than when we are under the weather. Send friends who are under the weather a funny e-mail or call them up and tell them a funny story. Laughter is the medicine of the soul and the sound of healing.

A sense of humour helps us to cope with our anxieties and takes our minds off our troubles. It allows us to look at our distresses in a different way so that they do not affect us negatively. It gives us a breather by diverting our attention when things get too difficult to handle. Laughter and humour are gifts with no cultural, social or spiritual exemptions that we can give to ourselves and to each other.

Because humour and laughter are symptoms of good health and well-being, try to integrate into your life. Hang out with people who are uplifting and think positively. Go see a funny play or go to a comedy club. Stay away from those who are always complaining and pull you down. Humour is the safest and cheapest form of medicine we can get either over or under the counter – so go ahead and overdose, it's healthy for you.

Bonnie Kates is president and CEO of Tel Aide, the Jewish Distress Line, and a nurse who has worked in the City of Toronto's dental department for 33 years.

Alternative medicine: young Jews making a difference

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Neither Lisa Steinman nor Elyse Tera went to medical school, but they're among a growing number of young Jews bringing a personal touch to modern health care.

Tera, 34, of Ottawa, is an acupuncturist, while Steinman, '31, of Toronto, is a labour doula.

'This isn't a modern profession; it goes back to the time of Torah'

As alternative medicine practitioners, both believe their practice complements mainstream medicine. If clients arrive with undiagnosed pain, Tera says, "I will ask them to see an medical doctor to get a diagnosis before I will treat them."

Steinman helps clients challenge the system and make informed decisions. While anyone can call herself a labour coach, doulas are trained to offer physical, emotional and educational support before, during and after childbirth.

Clients can approach Steinman at any point during pregnancy.

"I've had somebody call me a few hours after she found out she was pregnant; I've had somebody call me two weeks before she was due."

Many don't know what services she can provide, Steinman says. "The scope of what I do is much broader than people realize."

She is available by phone 24 hours a day. "Some women don't call me for six months, others call me twice a day."

After childbirth, she remains for a few hours, and she can also follow up at home by providing nursing and baby care.

Her degree in occupational therapy combined with doula training gives Steinman unique expertise. But as an observant Jew, she offers her mostly Jewish clientele a spiritual experience, too.

She places Tehillim cards under the mother's pillow, guides both parents in special prayers and explains the wealth of Jewish childbirth traditions.

She compares herself to Shifra and Puah, the labour attendants who rescued Jewish babies in Egypt.

"This isn't a modern profession; it goes back to the time of Torah. Our society went away from it... but it's now coming back."

Acupuncture, too, is rooted in ancient tradition, but it's too-often called a "miracle cure" for everything from smoking to blindness. Tera's approach is practical:

"Other factors can help or hinder a person's recovery... A person with asthma and allergies is not going to get better... [living] in a damp, mouldy basement."

Tera is often asked if acupuncture works, and she says, "it's held to higher standards than western medicine.

"People wouldn't blame a medical doctor if a particular medication doesn't help, but if acupuncture doesn't meet expectations – even unrealistic ones – they will say it failed.

"People also worry about needles, but they're too small to cause pain: You can fit up to 20 acupuncture needles into one needle that's used for drawing blood."

Acupuncture, which also offers drug-free treatment for many children's medical problems, is not generally covered by provincial health plans. Fees average $30 to $60 per session. Private plans may pay some costs, and coverage may broaden as alternative therapies gain recognition.

Doulas generally charge a flat rate, to encourage full use of their services. Fees range between $500 and $1,000, depending on her experience. Most charge slightly more for first babies.

Both Steinman and Tera came to their fields following painful experiences.

Steinman's first birth was traumatic, culminating in a Caesarean section. During her second pregnancy, she didn't want another Caesarean, but couldn't bear facing labour again.

Calling a VBAC [Vaginal Birth After Caesarean] organization, she was told to hire a professional doula.

Chaya Smuckler, with more than 20 years experience, helped the couple remain home as long as possible and reassured Steinman about the birth.

"On the way to the hospital, I started crying... I was so excited my baby was coming."

Smuckler "turned my experience of birth around... I thought if I could do this for other people, I want to try."

After mentoring and formal study, Steinman was certified by Doulas of North America (DONA).

She says, "I try to help the couple have the birth experience they want – not the one that I want."

She also sees it as a spiritual imperative. "It's an honour to be asked to attend the birth... I have to be able to do it properly. It's... such a moment of kedushah [holiness] when the neshamah [soul] comes into the world; it's a tremendous place to be."

Tera became disillusioned at 20 following hip reconstruction.

"My surgeon didn't believe in any kind of post-surgery therapy," she says.

"After three months, the doctor said, I was healed, even though the muscles in my leg had atrophied."

Pamper yourself at a spa: it's good for you

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

If you love going to the spa but feel guilty being pampered, take heart: some spa treatments are actually good for your health.

I was recently introduced to the healing power of the spa by three Toronto experts who treated me to relaxing facial massages and a stone therapy pedicure.

Trina Silano

Insisting that I had to try the spa experience to believe it, I visited Salon U Skin Care owner Marla Baker (416-781-2001), who specializes in facial treatments, Trina Silano, the owner of Upper Village Spa (416-782-1539), and Orit Mahfouda, an aesthetician at Ramy's Salon and Spa (416-256-7545).

One by one – using the latest in skin care, spa and aromatherapy treatments – they restored circulation to my feet and face, cleared my stuffed up sinuses and alleviated a bothersome headache.

"People don't realize how good the spa can be for certain health problems," said Silano, who works with her sister Cheri and a number of other specialists in her elegant, living-room comfortable spa on Eglinton Avenue near Allen Road.

The newest therapeutic treatment offered by Upper Village Spa is the stone therapy massage.

"Stone therapy is a massage technique using soft, heated rocks made of lava," said Silano, noting the technique just came to Canada six months ago.

"The treatment improves circulation, which is important for pregnant women and people who are on their feet all day."

Not only is the massage technique incredibly relaxing, but it's also said to alleviate chronic neck and back pain, ease water retention, sooth the nervous system and increase energy in the body, Silano said.

"It's also great for stress from tight muscles and stress from arthritis."

The healing properties of a facial are also vast, said Mahfouda, who studied her trade in Israel before starting a practice in Toronto 15 years ago.

With candles flickering in their holders and soft music playing in the background, Mahfouda gave me a relaxing facial massage, ridding me of a headache and clearing my stuffed-up sinuses. It was, as she promised, an out-of-this-world experience.

Orit Mahfouda

"I use massage oil with different scents to accomplish different things," she explained. "Mint, for example, clears the sinuses. I also take pressure off the face and neck by touching different pressure points."

Operating out of Dani's Salon at 3381 Bathurst St., Baker improves the look and texture of skin using products like pharmaceutical-grade glycolic acid and various therapeutic serums.

"Like our bodies, our skin becomes stressed on a daily basis," said Baker, who became immersed in the trade at age 5, when her mother began building Caryl Baker Visage, a line of skin-care and makeup products.

"Artificial heat, light and dirt from the environment, the food we eat and the amount of sleep we get takes its toll on the skin. Purification and scrub treatments clear away the dead skin and removes the dirt and oil that clog pores," Baker said. "The massage helps relax facial muscles and increases blood flow."

Marla Baker

Baker also offers a special rejuvenation treatment using a Derma-Wand, a high-frequency tool that oxygenates the skin, kills surface bacteria and restores lost muscle tone.

If you're still skeptical, visit a spa. It can keep the doctor – and pain – away.

New technology helps relieve heel pain

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A new, non-invasive and painless therapy offers relief from plantar fascitis, a condition that causes severe heel pain.

Toronto podiatrist Hartley Miltchin has imported the technology, called DolorClast radial soundwave therapy (RST) from Switzerland. "I am always looking for new or better ways to help my patients," he told The CJN.

"The company [Electro Medical Systems] approached me, knowing that I'm in the forefront of new technologies, provided they seem worthwhile investigating, and there is no risk to the patient," he said.

Miltchin explained that plantar fascitis occurs when the thick, fibrous band running from the toes to the heel – the plantar fascia – becomes unable to stretch as it should. Over time, the band tears and the area becomes inflamed.

"That's what hurts," he said.

The pain is worse after resting, he said, and if not treated, it can become more severe and constant. "People describe it like a knife, is in their heel."

The DolorClast Radial Soundwave Therapy combines air pressure and electronics to produce sound-wave energy with a computerized, controlled frequency. The operator holds a metal rod against the site of the pain for five minutes. The procedure, which is repeated three times over a three-to-four week period, sends sound waves to the area, to build new blood vessels so as to heal the tear, Miltchin explained.

No anesthetic is required. There are also no after-effects, and no recovery time is needed, he said.

While the procedure is very safe, Miltchin warned that people with pacemakers, malignancies or taking blood thinners, as well as pregnant women, should not undergo the procedure.

DolorClast RST is not the first new technology Miltchin has introduced to his practice. In 1993, he introduced endoscopic plantar fasciotomy, in which he makes a tiny incision in the heel and inserts a tiny camera and a surgical blade. The camera projects the image of the heel area onto a television monitor, which enables Miltchin to see what is going on inside the foot and to cut away the torn part.

The procedure is done in his office, and patients can get around much faster afterward than with conventional surgery. He also uses the technique for such persistent foot conditions as callouses, bunions, and corns.

Miltchin explained that a doctor of podiatric medicine is a "highly trained foot specialist" who must complete four years of study at an American podiatry school ("There is no such school in Canada," he said), as well as one to four years in a surgical residency.

Miltchin deals with other foot problems besides those needing radial soundwave therapy or endoscopic plantar fasciotomy. Flat feet, ingrown toenails, corns, lower back pain caused by foot problems, and routine care for diabetics, including orthotics and nail care and callouses, are all important parts of his practice.

Miltchin considers his profession his "passion," and he does considerable volunteer work for it, including serving as executive director of the Canadian Podiatric Medical Association. "I want to educate the public that caring for feet is just as important as looking after your eyes and teeth."

Even his favourite hobby relates to podiatry.

"I have the largest collection of celebrity-worn shoes, cleats, and ballet shoes around," he said, adding that the footwear, currently kept in a temperature-controlled storage facility, will be donated to the Bata Shoe Museum this spring.

Meditation and Jewish prayer go hand in hand

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

It might not be the way your bubbie used to daven, but a growing number of Jews are using meditation to make prayer meaningful and enriching.

Chashi Skobac, a leading lecturer on Jewish meditation, says the two are not as distinct as we assume. The Shema, she says, is traditionally said seated with covered eyes, focusing consciously on the sound of each syllable. This is the essence of meditation.

Skobac speaks of a gap in our perception between nature and holiness. As Jews, "we are commanded to connect with God at all times." But because God is invisible, we are distracted by the visible all around us and don't recognize "ordinary" godliness.

Skobac says "all of Jewish practice aims to close that gap," helping us appreciate "everyday miracles."

The problem, according to Skobac, is that we're too easily distracted. Trying to compensate, sometimes we even pray less in an effort to make old, familiar prayers seem fresh. Skobac suggests the opposite: draw out prayers and they become more meaningful.

Meditation, says Skobac, lets us appreciate God's nearness in our surroundings. God is continually creating, but we often miss this ongoing phenomenon. Meditating lets us tune in to God's will.

Imagine a rear-projection screen, she says. "We're on one side, and God is projecting on the other."

Chashi Skobac

She notes that "people complain about the repetitiveness of Jewish prayer" when really "we don't know how to focus. We don't know how to use the repetitions to our advantage. Our lifestyle is too hurried." If we learn to not only accept repetitiveness but to appreciate it, we can build meaningful prayer experiences.

Slowing down can be as simple as a sigh, Skobac teaches, saying Rabbi Nachman of Breslov compared a sigh of relaxation to God's breath into Adam's nostrils. Sighing is a luxury we can learn to appreciate through meditation, she says Jewish meditation is nothing new. In the First Temple period, when people would offer an animal sacrifice, "they'd lean their weight on the animal," Skobac says. She calls this a "dramatic meditation," a forceful "glue" bringing together the action of sacrificing together with the kavanah (intention) of achieving closeness to God.

In the days of the Temple, Skobac says, spontaneous prayer was commonplace in Judaism. "It was very heartfelt and sincere." Prophets taught more than a million Jews the techniques of spontaneous, meditative prayer. But with the destruction of the Temple, many standardized prayers were composed, including the Shmoneh Esrei, or Amidah, which is still recited three or four times a day.

Its creators didn't envision the Amidah as a prayer at all, says Skobac. "It was originally intended as a meditation." Back when it was written, many people would spend up to an hour reciting its 18 blessings.

Standardized prayer was never intended to replace spontaneity, Skobac says. Rabbi Nachman emphasized "hitbodedut" – isolated, spontaneous communication with God – and Skobac offers suggestions for applying meditation techniques to traditional Judaism.

Taking the four-letter name of God and substituting different vowels under the "yud" "hey" "vav" and "hey" can create a sacred sound focus usually referred to as a "mantra."

Your zaide might never have known anything about mantras, but he probably knew all about shuckling. Skobac says this and other traditional prayer techniques were also probably meditative devices. "A rocking motion helps with focus," she says.

Modern Jewish practices all started out as tools to help us connect with our divine source, but over time, "the tools become tarnished," Skobac says. Through her classes, she tries to teach ordinary Jews to polish their existing tools and embrace new ones.

But what makes Jewish meditation Jewish? For Skobac, it's combining a Jewish goal with Jewish content, like the name of God or the syllables of the Shema. Meditation before prayer can focus on an object, a word, "even an idea" – any Jewish motif.

You might not find these techniques in a minyan near you just yet, but you can use them anywhere to improve focus and concentration. Spontaneity isn't always possible in a group, but even in the absence of like-minded Jews, Skobac suggests slowing down and appreciating each word, no matter how familiar.

With enhanced appreciation of every breath, we can acquire the tools to make the most of our prayers and connect with God in the fullest way possible. "It doesn't have to take an hour," she says. "Just take time."

Skobac describes the traditional Jewish meditation position: sitting comfortably, in a chair, feet flat on the floor, arms loose, muscles relaxed. Take a deep breath, then… sigh. Make noise as you exhale. Close your eyes if you want to. And don't worry about all the things you need to do or the people you've got to see.

Relax – you're doing a mitzvah!

Alternative medicine

Massage helped restore function, and Tera began studying alternatives to surgery and medication. She found that while western medicine understood the mechanics of the human body, it didn't understand people.

Eventually, she went to Boston for a three-year master's degree in acupuncture.

"I didn't want a fly-by-night weekend or month-long program… I wanted a school that had a professional curriculum."

Chinese medicine emphasizes pro-active care, rather than a disease/cure model, Tera says.

"The more we're aware of our bodies when we're healthy, the easier it'll be to stay healthy or recover if we do get sick or injured."

"I ask questions about your whole health, not just your symptom of the day."

She stresses communication. "You will… leave my office knowing what your condition is and what I can do about it."

Women seek serenity at weekend retreats

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Eva Karpati, Keely Sherman and Elana Milman feel that sometimes you just have to get away from your life.

The three Toronto-area women run semi-annual weekend retreats for women that feature yoga, nia – a technique that incorporates ethnic and modern dance and martial arts – and expressive arts, in which participants express themselves through such things as spontaneous painting, writing, moving and singing.

Sherman, 32, who studied in India at an ashram (a yoga and meditation retreat), said that practising yoga is a way of getting in touch with yourself and bringing out happiness, joy and peace.

"When I returned to Toronto, I saw that people were soaking up the whole yoga thing, but to experience the true joy of yoga you have to get away from your life.

"In order to go deep within yourself, you have to leave the city and get away from external distractions. A retreat is the perfect setting."

It is also a time for some fun, she said. "When I am on a retreat, I often feel like breaking out and dancing."

With that in mind, Sherman approached Karpati, 48, who taught nia at a fitness club where Sherman taught yoga. "We decided that we could combine the fun of dance with the depth of yoga."

They then teamed up with Milman, 55, an educator and artist who teaches expressive art.

"The whole combination of yoga, nia and expressive art, allows women to reconnect with their own beauty and then see the beauty of the world. Once someone feels good about themselves, they can see the good in everything else," Karpati said.

The idea is to "remove all our distresses so we can connect with our bliss. Each form takes us there in a different way; that is why they are complementary," she said.

Milman said the retreats provide women with the "right recipe to feel good about themselves. Most said that in the time they were with us, they completely forgot about work, home and stress."

The women, who range in age from 25 to 70, bonded with each other immediately, said Karpati. "Their openness to receiving each other was overwhelming. They felt comfortable and nurtured.

Weekend retreats are becoming increasingly popular as seen in these photos.

"They were able to let go of their roles and be no one but themselves. There were no expectations, and they were not pushed to do anything," she said.

The women did incredible things because they felt so comfortable with each other. "They danced as if no one was watching," said Karpati.

Vera Gillman, who attended her first retreat in the fall, said that participants who were new to the three specialties were eased into them, yet those with previous experience were presented with enough challenges to keep them absorbed.

"The entire weekend was bustling, yet at the same time serene. Activities were varied, but continuity was achieved, as well as a great flow of energy among participants," she said.

Sherman said the retreat was reminiscent of ancient cultures in which women gathered together at the well. "Our culture needs a place for women to bond. It helps us connect to our most primitive needs."

Smart choices for a healthier you

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Food that's good for you should taste good! Here are some heartsmart suggestions that will help you sneak more nutrition onto your plate – and palate!

SMART SHOPPING!

Make a grocery list in advance to help avoid temptation when wandering through the grocery aisles. Shopping when hungry leads to impulsive, unwise food choices. If junk foods don't pass through the checkout counter, they won't pass through your lips and end up on your hips!

Did you realize that the most frequently purchased foods are farthest from the door? This forces you to pass many tempting items en route through the store. Shop the perimeter of the store, where essentials such as dairy products, produce, lean meat, poultry, fish and whole-grain breads are found.

For maximum nutrition, fill your cart with the big four – vegetables, fruits, grains and legumes. Green cuisine is lean, packed with vitamins, minerals and phytochemicals. Choose whole foods instead of processed, packaged foods that often contain hydrogenated, saturated or trans fats. An apple doesn't need a low-fat label!

Frozen vegetables, fruits and juices are handy when you run out of fresh produce. Buy them last so they don't defrost before you get home.

SMART BUYS!

Check package labels for nutritional information. When possible, choose low-sodium and low-fat foods, and those containing minimal amounts of sugar. Be cautious of serving sizes marked on packaged foods – they are not always realistic. Choose foods that are higher in fibre and nutrients, such as whole-grain cereals, breads and grains, fresh or frozen fruits and vegetables.

Fat-free foods contain less than half a gram of fat per serving. Low-fat foods contain less than three grams of fat per serving. Reduced means at least 25 per cent less calories, sodium or sugar than the regular version. Light/lite foods contain one-third fewer calories, or no more than half the fat of the higher-calorie, higher fat version. Cholesterol-free foods contains less than two milligrams of cholesterol and two grams or less of saturated fat per serving. Low-calorie foods contain fewer than 40 calories per serving.

SMART MEAL PLANNING!

A healthy, well-balanced meal should be high in fibre, vitamins, minerals and other nutrients, and low in saturated and trans fats. There is no such thing as the perfect, magical food. When planning meals, concentrate on colour and variety. Food should be appealing as well as delicious.

Use the following guide to help you with daily meal planning. Select healthy choices within each food group to stay on target with health promotion and disease prevention – the quality of the food you eat is just as important as the quantity!

• Grains (5-12 servings):
Choose high fibre grains (e.g., cereals, breads, brown rice, pasta, kasha, etc.) Cut back on processed grain foods (e.g, pastries, candies, cookies).

• Vegetables (3-5 servings):
Choose a variety of fresh colourful vegetables each day, and include plenty of dark green leafy vegetables and legumes each week. Cut back on fried and processed veggies.

• Fruit (2-4 servings):
Choose a variety of fresh, frozen (without sugar), canned (water-packed) and dried fruit each day. Cut back on fruit in syrup.

• Milk Products (2-3 servings):
Choose low-fat dairy foods (e.g., low-fat and skim milk, plain yogurt, low-fat cheeses). Cut back on dairy products with added sugar and those that are high in saturated fat.

• Meat, poultry, fish, tofu, beans, eggs and nuts (2-3 servings):
Choose lean meats. Be sure to watch your portion sizes. (One serving is the size of a deck of cards.) Cut back on processed and high fat meats.

• Fats, oils, and sweets (use sparingly):
Choose vegetable oils that are liquid at room temperature (e.g., olive, canola, safflower and grapeseed oils). Avoid saturated and trans fats, found in full-fat dairy foods, meats, margarine and highly processed foods. Cut back on added sugar to reduce caloric intake.

SMART FIBRE FACTS!

Fill up with fibre! Aim for 20 to 35 grams of fibre a day. Good sources of fibre include beans and legumes, flaxseed, wheat bran, wheat germ, oats, cereals, fruits and vegetables. And be sure to drink lots of water!

Beans and lentils are high in soluble fibre. If possible, include them in your meals four or five times a week. Add them to soups and salads. Pureed kidney beans can be used to thicken spaghetti sauces, stews or soups. Add pureed chickpeas to meat loaf or meatball mixtures.

Sneak vegetables into your snacks and meals wherever possible. Add them to casseroles, pasta sauces, pizzas, stir-fries and sandwich fillings. Make cream-free cream soups by pureeing some of the vegetables (e.g., carrots, potatoes, sweet potatoes).

SMART SUPPERTIME & SNACK SOLUTIONS!

These quick, easy recipes are low in calories and fat, yet full of flavour. Enjoy!

• Oven-Roasted Vegetables: Preheat your oven to 450. Slice vegetables half-inch thick; arrange in a single layer on a lightly sprayed pan. Rub lightly with olive oil, salt, pepper and your favourite herbs. Zucchini takes six to eight minutes; asparagus, mushrooms or green beans take 10 to 12 minutes, onions take 30 minutes. Roasted root vegetables (e.g., carrots, turnips, parsnips, sweet potatoes) take about 45 minutes at 400 degrees.

• Microwaved Onions: Rinse onions but do not peel. Pierce in several places with a sharp knife. Microwave on high for three minutes for one onion, six to seven minutes for two onions, until tender. When cool, discard the skin, then chop or puree. They'll add fat-free flavour to mashed potatoes, sauces and salad dressings.

• Brown Rice in Half the Time: Rinse and drain one cup of brown basmati rice. Combine with two cups of water in a saucepan; soak several hours. Bring to a boil, reduce heat and simmer covered for 22 minutes. Let stand covered for 10 minutes.

• Chick Tricks: Marinate boneless, skinless chicken breasts in your favourite low-fat marinade or salad dressing, place in meal-size packages and freeze uncooked. (Make extras for future meals.) When needed, defrost and bake uncovered at 400 degrees for 20 minutes.

• Fishful Thinking: Line a glass baking dish with washed lettuce leaves. Arrange salmon fillets or steaks in a single layer; sprinkle with salt, pepper, lemon or lime juice, basil, dill or thyme. Cover with another layer of lettuce. Microwave on High, allowing 4 to 5 minutes per pound of fish. Delicate and delicious! (P.S. Salmon is high in Omega-3 fatty acids, making it a smart meal choice. For an even smarter choice, eat fish twice a week.)

Choosing a nursing home

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Talk to a few people who have had to place a loved one in a nursing home, and you'll likely hear a range of experiences and emotions – everything from gratitude for good care to anger and frustration over neglect and loss of dignity.

So how does one begin to navigate the application process and find an appropriate institution?

One place to start could be an agency like Circle of Care – a non-profit, multi-service agency that serves seniors and other adults – where a client can meet with a social worker at no charge to discuss options.

Sometimes people begin by raising the issue with their family doctors, or they can go directly to one of the Ontario government Community Care Access Centres through which nursing home applications are made, said Mark Weitz, a social worker at Circle of Care.

To access your local Community Care Access Centre in Ontario, call the province's health information line at 1-800-268-1153. Phone numbers for other agencies and government offices across Canada can be found on the Internet at www.caregiver.on.ca/nwnwrg.html. The Jewish Information Service (416-635-5600) can provide a list of long-term care facilities and retirement homes, some of which provide limited health care. It should be noted, however, that retirement homes are not regulated as nursing homes, but fall under the Landlord Tenant Act.

A new book by American social worker Karen Shoff – There's No Place Like (a Nursing) Home – is based on the premise that nursing homes can be avoided with advance legal and financial planning.

Based on her professional experience, Shoff paints a dismal picture of nursing home life. Even the better ones can't escape the fact they are institutions, she points out. She cared for her father, who had suffered a massive stroke, for almost a year in her home, using paid caregivers, until his death at age 98.

Shoff admits that during her years as a gerontological social worker, she never advised a family to do what she did. "Bringing an elderly, ill parent into one's own home is a very personal decision."

For those who take the nursing home route – usually because a person has become too physically frail or cognitively impaired to take care of themselves – there are a number of good questions they should ask, said Weitz.

Among the questions Weitz suggests are the following:

- What types of beds are available? (The government will contribute to the monthly cost of a "basic" bed – $1,445.71 – if a person cannot afford the full amount. Semi-private and private rooms cost extra.)
- How much of their own furniture and belongings can residents bring in?
- What is the ratio of staff to residents?
- How much programming is there? Are there a variety of activities?
- How long is the waiting list to get in?

If you feel comfortable doing so, it's a good idea to talk to residents or their families, Weitz said. Ask what they think of the care, the food, and the programming. "You should get the goods straight from them."

The Internet also offers a wealth of ideas. A quick search for "choosing a nursing home" on the search engine Google turns up 4,720 sites.

The U.S. site www.ltc-resources.com (Long-Term Resources.com) has practical recommendations, beginning from the moment you first approach the building. Look around, it advises. "Are the grounds well maintained? Is trash overflowing the dumpsters at the back of the facility?" Other suggestions include checking whether residents are well-groomed and out of bed, and how staff interact with residents; looking at what costs are not included in the monthly fee; and even tasting the food.

The site urges people to consider making two visits, one during normal business hours and another after hours or on a weekend, to see whether there is adequate staff coverage at those times.

A Canadian article, from Healthy Way magazine on Sympatico's Web site (www.nb.sympatico.ca/Contents/ Health/HEALTHYWAY/archive/feature_alz2.html), discusses safety, cleanliness and medical care, among other issues. "Find out if the home is affiliated with a hospital, and ask how medical emergencies are dealt with," it recommends. "Will your family physician still be able to care for your parent in the nursing home? Ask how many residents are assigned to each nurse, and enquire about the availability of special therapists."

For Jewish families, Weitz added, it's important to get a sense of how the home will accommodate cultural and religious needs: Is the food kosher or kosher-style? Is there a chapel or a place where Jews can worship on-site? Is there a rabbi? Is there cultural programming for Jews? Are there any connections with synagogues or Jewish schools? For example, do schoolchildren come into the home to sing or do holiday programming with the residents?

"All these things are really important to add to the life of the person," said Weitz.

Clinics treat the whole person

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Treating the whole person is the credo behind two Toronto medical clinics that offer patients one-stop shopping for a variety of health services.

The Genesis Professional Group in the city's north and the Mind-Body Medicine Company in midtown are two clinics that have expanded the boundaries of what has traditionally been expected during a visit to a doctor's office.

At the Genesis Group's offices, designed to resemble the welcoming ambience of a family den, Doctors Rochelle Schwartz and Sharla Lichtman offer services geared to promoting wellness, the integration of physical, mental and spiritual elements in health and the treatment of the whole person.

The model they adopted is somewhat novel in the health delivery system currently practiced in Ontario, and includes personalized, in-depth, non-OHIP services in exchange for a fee – $2,500 per year.

"When someone first comes in, we spend initially two to three hours with them, going over their physical, social, psychological health," Lichtman said. "We try to identify areas of life that we should focus on."

Usually, medical issues have a lifestyle component. For example, for people with diabetes, it could be diet; for people with breast cancer, physical strength is a factor and exercise might be a response; for someone suffering headaches, stress in their family relationships might be the key factor, she said.

Based on the doctors' initial assessment, patients will be directed to the appropriate, in-house professional. The Genesis Group includes a dietician, exercise therapist and a lifestyle stress counselor (a social worker by profession).

Following their assessments, the professionals meet to discuss a course of action.

"The team puts together a health care plan, whether from a physical point of view, an emotional point of view, a fitness point of view," Schwartz said. "It's a team approach to health care and a comprehensive approach to health care."

It's a dynamic relationship that includes follow-up phone calls to see how the patient is doing and to reassure them before they embark on other, out of office tests.

For Schwartz and Lichtman, with 16 years and 14 years in family practice respectively, they feel they are now practicing medicine the way they were taught in university when the basis for a family practice was to treat the whole person, not just a symptom.

In addition to benefiting patients, the Genesis approach has given the doctors their lives back. "Now it's a pleasure [to practice medicine]," Lichtman said. "It's like taking care of family."

And it's a far cry from the 12- to 14-hour days they endured early in their careers.

"It's rewarding to the patient, but it's even more rewarding to us," Schwartz said.

South of the Genesis offices, in midtown Toronto, Dr. Mark Gilbert has been taking a similar "holistic" approach to health care. Co-founder (along with his wife, Dr. Heather Tick) of the Mind-Body Medicine Company, Gilbert believes that many patients present something of a symptom stew, "like a tzimmes that includes many ingredients."

The clinic looks at a variety of components that might have gone into the patient's feeling of distress, including the physical, social and emotional, he said.

"We have scientific evidence demonstrating that the three major organ systems – the nervous system, the endocrine system and the immune system – are all directly communicating with each other," he said.

The result is that a patient's emotional state has a huge impact on his or her physical well being.

Clinical research indicates that people in groups, those with comforting belief systems, people in supportive relationships and those who say they have a purpose in life show reduced need for medicines. Many eventually are able to put pharmacological agents behind them, Gilbert said.

The research indicates "we have to treat the whole person at the physical, emotional, psychological and spiritual levels. We have to cover all our bases."

Gilbert said the clinic, while it may not always be able to "cure" someone (that implies a "fix from the outside"), may be able to "heal them.

"Our purpose is to allow people to learn the tools and techniques to be able to better cope with the stresses in their lives, to deal with trauma, to [find] a purpose in their lives and to develop new relationships."

To assist patients along the road to healing, the clinic offers a variety of health services: a family practitioner, a psychiatrist, nursing care, naturopathic doctors, kinesiology, massage therapy, physiotherapy, a nutritionist, movement awareness therapy, chiropractor, psychologist and a social worker.

Some of these services are covered under OHIP, Gilbert said.

New patients are first seen by a family physician who "triages" the patient to others in the clinic. A team of professionals examines the patient, develops an assessment (which includes an appraisal of the patients' support system in the community) and devises a treatment plan.

For Gilbert, addressing the patient's emotional needs is key. "We know it's very important to feel connected in life. People who perceive they're cared about, these people are protected from illness."

Zundel coming to Canada?

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Holocaust denier Ernst Zundel may be deported to Canada from his home in Tennessee as early as this week, but Jewish groups are lobbying immigration authorities to turn the Nazi sympathizer away.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada are calling on Citizenship and Immigration (CIC) Minister Denis Coderre to bar Zundel from returning to Canada, where he lived as a permanent resident from 1958 to 2000.

They argue Canada should wash its hands of the Nazi propagandist and ask the United States to exercise its jurisdiction and return him instead to his native Germany.

"We believe he has no basis to be in Canada and should be sent to Germany," said Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber. "Our belief is that he has abandoned his residency by moving to the United States, and Canada has every right to refuse him entry."

First ever haredi mayor of Jerusalem

Olmert resigns, headed to cabinet

By JONATHAN LIS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Uri Lupoliansky of the Agudat Yisrael party was appointed acting mayor of Jerusalem on Monday, the first haredi to assume this office.

Uri Lupoliansky

Lupoliansky, whose appointment reflects the rising power of the haredi community in Jerusalem, promised Sunday to preserve the city's religious status quo. Lupoliansky will serve until a special municipal election is held, probably in October.

Ehud Olmert

Mayor Ehud Olmert tendered his resignation Monday morning and then swore allegiance as an incoming member of the 16th Knesset a few hours later. Olmert is expected to receive a major cabinet post once a government coalition is formed.

"People should not be judged on the basis of their lifestyle and dress, but on the basis of their acts," Lupoliansky told city council yesterday. "I extend my hand to all. I will be everyone's mayor and act to reduce the feelings of discrimination and neglect among the residents of east Jerusalem."

ISRAEL

Parties Merge

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Yisrael b'Aliyah leader Natan Sharansky signed a deal earlier this month to merge their parties. As a result, Sharon's Likud party will increase its Knesset representation to 40 seats. In exchange, the immigrant-rights party will receive a cabinet position in the next government, where Sharansky will be in charge of Diaspora affairs and Jerusalem, Ha'aretz reported. Yisrael b'Aliyah dropped from four to two seats in January's election.

New Beepers

JERUSALEM — More than 7,000 hearing impaired Israelis will now be able to receive civil defence announcements via special beepers purchased by the Jewish Agency for Israel with funds provided by the North American Israel Emergency Campaign. The beepers, linked to home front command headquarters, will inform recipients immediately of an impending attack using vibrations, lights, bells and print messages. JAFI said it raised about $1 million (US) to buy 5,000 new beepers and upgrade 2,000 older models.

Patriots Arrive

JERUSALEM — Two Patriot missile batteries arrived in Israel last week after being shipped from Germany. The missiles will be used for defence in case of a possible attack by Iraq.

WORLD

Israel on UN Body

NEW YORK — Israel was elected to a United Nations General Assembly body for the first time in decades. The assembly unanimously chose an Israeli delegate as one of three vice-chairs serving on the Working Group on Disarmament, led by Indonesia. Israel's candidacy was presented by the Western European and Others group, which Israel joined in May 2000 after years as the only nation excluded from one of the UN's regional groups. It was the first time since that WEOG backed Israel's candidacy for a UN body.

Heightened Security

NEW YORK — Masked anti-terror police stood guard Feb. 8 outside New York's Temple Emanu-El as security was beefed up at U.S. Jewish sites after authorities went on a heightened state of alert for a possible Al Qaeda attack. The decision to raise the nation's terror-alert level reportedly was made due to increased threats against Jewish institutions.

Funds Distributed

NEW YORK — The Claims Conference said it allocated nearly $76 million (US) last year to help Holocaust victims in need. The funds, distributed in more than 30 countries, were used for such things as hunger relief, medical care, rent subsidies, day-care centres and nursing homes. About $8.6 million was allocated to organizations doing Holocaust research, education and documentation, and about $13 million went to agencies that serve survivors in more than 50 communities across North America, the group said.

Dovish Rabbi Barred

SAN FRANCISCO — A dovish editor and rabbi was prevented from speaking at an anti-war rally Sunday in San Francisco. Michael Lerner, editor of Tikkun Magazine and a frequent critic of Israeli policy, was barred for criticizing one group in a coalition of 120 rally sponsors. Lerner has criticized the group, known by the initials A.N.S.W.E.R., because he says it has used past rallies to put forward anti-Israel propaganda. An A.N.S.W.E.R. spokesperson was quoted as saying that the group would not agree to have a "pro-Israel" speaker at the rally.

Jew Definition Altered

LONDON — The publisher of a Scrabble dictionary has agreed to alter its definition of "Jew," used as a verb, after a complaint by the Board of Deputies of British Jews. The board praised the decision by Chambers Publishers to replace "to cheat or get the better of" with "old offensive word meaning to haggle."

Papon Release Upheld

PARIS — An appeals court last week upheld an earlier decision to release Nazi-era war criminal Maurice Papon on health grounds. But Papon, 92, could still be returned to jail if future medical checks find his condition has improved. The French minister of justice had requested the hearing after Papon, convicted for his role in the deportation of more than 1,500 Jews in wartime France, was released last year when an appeals court ruled he was too old and sick to serve out his 10-year jail term. He had served four years before his release. The move created a storm of protest, especially after Papon was seen leaving the prison unassisted.

Court Clears Yahoo Over Nazi Auctions

PARIS — A French court last week acquitted the former president of Internet giant Yahoo of charges of condoning Nazi war crimes.

The court ruled that Timothy Koogle and Yahoo did not condone or praise Nazism, even though the Internet portal once auctioned Nazi memorabilia.

Koogle, who left his post at Yahoo in 2001, faced up to five years in jail and a fine of nearly $50,000 (US) in a trial prompted by a complaint filed in October 2001 by French Jewish groups and anti-racism activists.

It is illegal under French law to exhibit or sell objects with racist overtones. Yahoo's French site offered no auctions of Nazi memorabilia, but Internet users in France had been able to purchase such items from the main U.S.-based site.

The ruling may spell the end of the legal fight that led to a landmark decision in France, when a court ordered Yahoo to block French Web surfers from auctions selling Nazi memorabilia. Yahoo eventually banned Nazi material as it began charging users to make auction listings, saying it did not want to profit from such material.

Special needs funds not reaching private schools

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Millions of dollars allocated two years ago for special needs students in independent schools are not reaching the children, the principal of Zareinu Educational Centre told Health Minister Tony Clement.

At a meeting held earlier this month, principal Carol Goldman said the current "pocket of money" isn't flowing through to the private schools because the standards for eligibility limit the funds to "medical or physical disabilities" and don't specifically mention developmental and mental needs.

The government's intent to "eliminate unfair barriers for special needs children seeking a faith-based education" was first announced on page 13 of the 2000-2001 budget: "Through the Ministry of Health, we are delivering on our promise by proposing to extend funding for the medical requirements of special needs students in all denominational schools."

The paragraph went on to state that "it is the fair and equitable thing to do."

According to a spokesperson for the Ministry of Health, $3.4 million was allocated in 1999 "to expand professional health services for children in private schools." Included were such things as speech and language therapy and physiotherapy.

The following year, $11 million was added for "personal support services and medical and personal equipment for children with medical requirements or a physical disability."

Kevin Finnerty, assistant director of communications for the Ministry of Health, said that this year only $6.6 million has been spent because "all the demand has been met for this program in the current policy framework."

At the Ministry of Finance, spokesperson Boni Fox Gray said the government is "currently in the [provincial] pre-budget planning stages."

She said it appears that "when they added the $11 million, they overestimated the demand under this program."

There are lots of pressures on the government now from "both public and private schools," she said.

However, these are issues that have to be resolved in the political arena by the ministers involved, Fox Gray added.

At the meeting with Clement and MPP Tina Molinari at Zareinu Educational Centre, Goldman explained that the money isn't being accessed by the children because of bottlenecks occurring at the Community Care Access Centres (CCAC), non-profit community boards authorized to distribute services for schoolchildren with special needs.

"Many CCACs have chosen to adopt a narrow definition of the clause and have decided that our students do not qualify because they have complex needs that include both developmental and physical challenges.

Exploration and discovery

From the editor's desk

Statistics Canada recently released figures that suggested there are approximately 350,000 people in Canada who consider themselves ethnically, as opposed to religiously, Jewish.

Historians generally agree that the first Jew to arrive in Canada, or in la Nouvelle France as it was then, was a 19-year-old woman named Esther Brandeau. In 1738, Brandeau arrived in the New World disguised as a young man. Shortly after her arrival in Quebec City, she was found out.

As a Jew however, she was not allowed to remain in Quebec. Indeed, all non-French non-Catholics were prohibited at that time from settling in Quebec. As historian Irving Abella has written: "When Cardinal Richelieu founded the Company of New France in 1627 to develop and explore the French territories in North America, he stipulated that they be open only to French Catholics. No Jews, Huguenots, no dissenters or foreigners of any sort were to be allowed admission. This order was reinforced by the infamous Black Code of 1685, which decreed that officials in every French possession in the world "drive out… all Jews… as enemies of the Christian name."

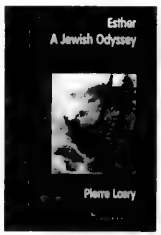
Thus, with the young Jew Esther Brandeau in their custody, Church authorities in Quebec set about to "persuade" her to convert to Catholicism. Despite the Church's best efforts for almost a year, Brandeau refused. If she could not remain in the New World as a Jew, she would not remain at all. She was sent back to France.

Her story is one of courage, commitment, determination and adventure. It is told with heart-stopping, imaginative force and sweeping historical detail in the award-winning book Une Juive en Nouvelle France, by Pierre Lasry, and in its English language version, translated by the author himself, Esther, A Jewish Odyssey, Midbar Editions, 2002.

Lasry is a veteran documentary filmmaker whose many noted works include the gripping National Film Board of Canada documentary, Shylock, which received effusively positive reviews when it was aired three years ago. Lasry has lived in Montreal since 1957, when he settled there after arrival from his native Morocco. It is apparent from the first few turns of the novel's pages, that he also is a writer of considerable literary skill and scholarly sweep.

The storyline of the book is based on the actual records of Brandeau's life as recorded from her interrogation in the minutes of Varin de la Mare, Harbour Police commissioner in Quebec City, in September 1738. The historical framework of the book has been meticulously researched and Lasry has powerfully and faithfully recreated the social and political textures of that unique period when western Europe was implanting its culture, religion and mores onto the faraway shores of North America.

In an interview with The CJN's Elias Levy almost two years ago, prior to the release of Une Juive, Lasry credited Ronald Finegold, librarian and researcher at the Montreal Jewish Library, and filmmaker Michelle Saada for helping him get started on the project of writing Esther Brandeau's story.



Like all superb writers, Lasry uses the portrait of his key character as a dramatic instrument by which he has painted a fabulously colourful, deeply moving, multi-dimensional portrait of the encounter between the Jews – including the Jews like Esther Brandeau who had practised their faiths secretly as New Christians – and the Catholic Church-dominated societies of continental and Nouvelle France. Indeed, Lasry goes to fascinating lengths to describe the encounter, generally, between the Church and other non-Catholic faiths. One poignant example occurs in the theological anguish expressed by an aboriginal from New France who has been converted to Catholicism, when he confronts the bigotry and hypocrisy of his mentors.

Equally compelling are Lasry's biting observations about the trade in "ebony," the slaves from Africa, that so dominated maritime commerce and traffic in Europe at that time.

Lasry's style combines precise attention to rich descriptive detail with an understated, somewhat off-the-cuff approach to personal reflection and commentary. Some of his most searing and explosive observations, for example, appear almost as afterthoughts in scenes heavily infused with gripping action.

One of Lasry's key purposes in writing this novel, I believe, was to pay tribute to the will and strength of the Jews, including the Marranos, who persevered in their ancestral faith, despite unceasing hardships and cruelties. His thoughts on the matter were encapsulated in the following observation: "These Jews, whether they study mere trifle, or deadly important subjects, always do it with the seriousness of a group of surgeons doing open-heart surgery without anesthetic. That is their whole mystery! If one opens an apple, one finds black seeds in the centre that will give apples. If one could open the Jewish people as a fruit to expose its core, one would see in it people who spend their entire life studying Torah, the Law, and teaching it to give birth to trees that will bear the new fruits of Judaism. Without seeds, no fruits."

Esther is an exciting, important book that illuminates a mostly unexplored, still shadowed part of Quebec history. It leads one to a rather intriguing speculation regarding the extent to which New Christians, i.e., Marranos, played a role in helping to found the New World that subsequently unfolded into modern Quebec society. Esther, a Jewish Odyssey should be widely read.

Anti-Semitism worries Canadian Jews: sociologist

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community in Canada has never had it better, but Canadian Jews are nevertheless gripped by a heightened sense of vulnerability, a conference at the University of Toronto on anti-Semitism was told last week.

Morton Weinfeld, a sociologist and holder of the chair in Canadian ethnic studies at McGill University, said the status of Canadian Jews compares favourably to that of Jews in the United States.

> • ANTISEMITISM:
> THE POLITICIZATION OF PREJUDICE IN THE CONTEMPORARY WORLD

"In many ways, Canada is a paradise for Jews. Gentiles in Canada want to marry Jews, not to harm them."

Hershell Ezrin, chief executive officer of GPC International, a public affairs and communications company that studies Canadian values, said anecdotal evidence suggests Jews feel more vulnerable these days.

Israel's conflict with the Palestinians is negatively affecting some Canadians' perceptions of Jews, he said.

Furthermore, he added, the ethnic nature of Canadian society is changing. This ongoing transformation is leaving people uncomfortable and sharpening anti-minority feelings in the country.

In Weinfeld's analysis, the influence of traditional anti-Semitic forces, such as the Catholic church in Quebec, has declined. And Jews face much less anti-Semitism in the workplace, but public manifestations of anti-Semitism, such as the David Ahenakew affair, have increased in importance, he said.

Contemporary anti-Semitism tends to turn on Israel. "This is the new thing," Weinfeld said. "There is a growing tie between anti-Americanism, anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism."

Weinfeld said today's political environment is different because of the increase of Muslims in Canada.

Jews should make greater efforts to reach out to other minority communities, which respect the Jewish community as a model of organization, he said.

Ezrin, who was a deputy minister in the Ontario civil service during the tenure of former Liberal premier David Peterson, said Mideast tensions have prompted some Canadians to wonder about Jewish influence in Canada.

The firebombings of synagogues in various parts of Canada, as well as other anti-Semitic acts, have prompted concern among Canadian Jews.

"We thought we were beyond all these things," Ezrin said.

Roy McMurtry, chief justice of Ontario's Court of Appeal and a former attorney-general, called anti-Semitism "one of the most vicious diseases ever visited upon the human race" and said "the state has a vital role in combating the dissemination of hatred.

"For me, the issues of anti-Semitism and racism are very much linked and represent an almost seamless web of evil."

McMurtry said that when he was in government, he urged law enforcement agencies to target anti-Semitic groups such as the Western Guard.

"Elected officials do have the right and the responsibility to urge police departments to prioritize certain investigations when the public interest will be clearly served," he said. "While many hate crimes fall short of physical violence, they are, nevertheless, equally destructive of our social fabric."

McMurtry said the willful promotion of hatred should not be confused with legitimate rights of expression. Yet laws must clearly reflect the mores and values of Canada.

Citing the Ahenakew case, he said public opprobrium of racists is more effective than prosecution.

Ed Morgan, a U of T law professor and chair of Canadian Jewish Congress (Ontario Region), said there must be free speech on campuses, but universities have a responsibility to protect students.

Political polemics do not constitute hatred, he said, referring to a York University professor who recently delivered a lecture on the "Nazification of Israel."

Yet students should not be subjected to what he called "extreme speech."

A problem also arises in debates on the Middle East when mistaken or extreme misstatements of fact are voiced, Morgan said.

University administrators should exercise fortitude in dealing with such problems, he said.

Mayo Moran, also a U of T law professor, said democratic societies face vexing and conflicting questions when they try to balance free speech with incitement to racial hatred.

A willingness to tolerate hate speech may be a litmus test for a democracy, she said.

Her colleague, Lorraine Weinrib, said the Jewish community has greatly benefited from the postwar liberal constitutional revolution in Canada.

She cited the striking down of the 1906 Lord's Day Act by the Supreme Court as an example of the court's positive role in fostering liberal democracy.

By successfully challenging the validity of the act, which banned Sunday shopping, and by other interventions, the Jewish community was instrumental in helping transform the very essence of Canadian law, said Weinrib.

In a sardonic and succinct survey, Leonard Dinnerstein, a University of Arizona historian, claimed that obese Americans, feminists and gays face far more prejudice than U.S. Jews.

Some Jewish organizations, for fundraising purposes, exaggerate the extent of anti-Semitism, he said.

The two-day conference was sponsored by the Munk Centre for International Studies.

Ex-athlete loses over 60 lbs. in 2 months!

My name is Steve Sawyer. I am a teacher. Thanks to hypnosis I lost over 60 pounds in six short months! My pant size dropped from a plump 44 to a trim 34. This is my true story.

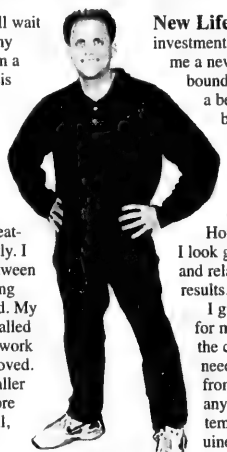
BEFORE

Fat & Lazy. I used to be an athlete in college. I kept my weight down because I'd run 120 miles a week. Then I blew out my knees. I gained weight and stayed overweight for 12 years. Snacking and fast food became my routine. I was on a constant trek to the refrigerator. My cholesterol was high and my energy was low. I felt fat and lazy.

Diets never worked for me. My bad habits would win every time. My stomach was in control.

I was skeptical of hypnosis. Even when my weight was melting off — six pounds my first week, twenty pounds my first month — I would say, "I'll wait until next week to see if my results keep up." Now I'm a believer! Hypnosis made my weight loss easy. I never felt like I was on a diet.

New Habits. Hypnosis stopped my bad eating habits instantly. I quit snacking between meals. I quit eating when I was bored. My doctor recently called to say my blood work had greatly improved. It's been simple. I eat smaller portions and healthier, more balanced foods. Best of all, I enjoy my healthy foods far more than the junk foods!



AFTER

New Life! Hypnosis is the smartest investment I've ever made. Hypnosis gave me a newfound freedom. I am no longer bound by laziness and bad habits. I am a better role model for my kids. My boss used to greet me with, "Hey, Big Man." Now I hear, "Hey, Skinny!" What a great feeling.

I tell friends that I am a walking billboard. People take one look at me and say, "Wow! How did you lose all that weight?" I look good and feel good. I'm calm and relaxed. With these kinds of results, people take notice!

I give hypnosis 99% of the credit for my weight loss and myself 1% of the credit for showing up! If you need to lose weight, I can tell you from experience, it's a waste to try anything else. Diets and drugs are temporary. Hypnosis gave me genuine, lasting weight loss results. It can do the same for you. I urge you to call now.

CBC editor defends coverage of Middle East at shul panel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The CBC's coverage of the Arab-Israeli conflict has angered many in the Jewish community and a recent panel discussion allowed community members to pepper one of the network's senior editors with questions that suggested the network has an anti-Israel bias.

Though six journalists were present at the Beit Rayim Synagogue in Richmond Hill to discuss reportage from Israel, it was the CBC's Mark Bulgutch who was forced to answer the most pointed questions from testy audience members.

Several wanted to know why the CBC refuses to label Palestinian suicide bombers "terrorists," while others questioned the lack of balanced reporting by the CBC's Jerusalem bureau chief, Neil Macdonald.

One of the panelists even added his own reproach, suggesting Macdonald had made himself the story and should be removed.

Bulgutch was joined on the panel by Lorrie Goldstein, editor of the Toronto Sun, John Turley-Ewart, letters editor of the National Post, Ron Waksman, executive producer of Global News, Gabe Gonda, letters editor of the Toronto Star and Drew Fagan, editor of the Globe and Mail's editorial page.

They were discussing "Israel bashing or honest reporting: what influences our Canadian media?" in an event sponsored by the Israel action committee of the Beit Rayim and Adath Sholom synagogues. Ellen Cole, chair of national community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, served as the evening's moderator.

Bulgutch, a senior executive producer with CBC News, gave as good as he got, saying a survey done for the CBC found "most Canadians think we're pro-Israel and anti-Palestinian." He rejected suggestions the CBC should use the term "terrorist," saying "terrorism is in the eye of the beholder." And he asserted "there's no conspiracy in the CBC to condemn Israel."

In a not-so-subtle criticism of the public network, Global's Waksman suggested "rules of engagement" for journalists reporting from the Middle East should include honesty, fairness and balance. He then added a direct potshot at the CBC, saying the network's editors failed to show the good sense to remove Macdonald once he had become part of the story.

In a question period that followed the remarks, Bulgutch again found himself on the defensive as he responded to queries about the CBC's objectivity.

A 28-year-veteran of the CBC, Bulgutch said he and the network's staff are professionals who don't let their personal views interfere with reporting. "I have opinions, but I think I can separate them from what I put on television. It's not hard."

Taking a swipe at the CBC, Turley-Ewart said the Post refuses to call Palestinian killers "militants. We call them terrorists, what they are. From our perspective, it's about values you hold... We call a spade a spade. If a person is a terrorist, that's what we'll call them. We're not going to walk in a fantasy world and pretend to be objective."

Later, Turley-Ewart criticized the Star, saying the Post would never have run a letter to the editor that called U.S. academic Daniel Pipes a racist.

Gonda responded by saying "there are reasonable people out there who think Pipes is a racist."

Gonda declined at various points to defend the Star's Mideast coverage, saying he was only able to comment on the letters page.

As the conversation turned back to the CBC's refusal to use the word "terrorist," Bulgutch said, "In our view, instead of name calling, we show you what happens and let you decide. You think it's easy?" he continued as the audience voiced its disapproval. "What is a definition that doesn't include Winston Churchill as a terrorist?"

Bulgutch acknowledged the network "made a mistake" after Sept. 11, when it referred to the attacks that day as terrorist incidents.

"Terms define a conflict," Goldstein said. "I was surprised when Reuters [news agency] decided not to use the term terrorist for those who blow up buses."

"Occupied territories" is also a loaded term, one that wasn't used when Jordan held the West Bank between 1948 and 1967, Goldstein said, adding that even his paper uses the term.

The passions engendered by the Middle East did not surprise Fagan, who reported from the Middle East from 1991 to 1996.

He noted how one reader complained about whether the "e" in "east Jerusalem" should be capitalized or rendered in lower case. Using lower case, the reader said, would suggest a geographical division and would support Israel's annexation. Upper case, as in "East Jerusalem," suggests a unique entity and would implicity not recognize Israeli control, Fagan recounted.

Turley-Ewart, a member of the Post's editorial board, said the Post is "perceived as the Jewish newspaper," and when it runs editorials backing Israel, the letters it gets are "shocking, absolutely shocking."

He said reporters are lazy when it comes to researching the historical context of the Middle East and suggested they should examine the UN resolutions they report on as well as the genesis of the term "occupied territories."

At a later point, Turley-Ewart and Bulgutch sparred, with Turley-Ewart saying "if you want to change the CBC's opinion, privatize it." Bulgutch noted pointedly that the Post does not have a reporter in the Middle East, while Turley-Ewart said the Post's views on the conflict are confined to the editorial page.

Goldstein said the suggestion to privatize the CBC is a legitimate topic of debate and said media consumers are free to encourage advertisers not to advertise with a network.

"A consumer boycott is a democratic right, Knock yourself out," he said.

THE HOLOCAUST
THROUGH A CHILD'S EYE
THE EXPERIENCE OF JEWISH CHILDREN DURING THE SHOAH

Public lecture given by Sharon Kangisser Cohen, renowned educator and award-winning researcher

Using stories of children during the Shoah, Ms. Kangisser Cohen will explore the different ways children and adults encountered the Holocaust

SUNDAY, MARCH 2, 2003, 8:00 PM
Congregation Habonim, 5 Glen Park Avenue

Ms. Kangisser Cohen, who specializes in the study of child survivors of the Holocaust, is a visiting scholar at New York University, and a Ph.D. candidate at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. She has taught at Yad Vashem and Hebrew University, and served as senior educator on several Holocaust educational field trips to Eastern Europe.

The public is also invited to attend Friday night services at Congregation Habonim (Friday, Feb. 28 at 8:15 p.m.), where Ms. Kangisser Cohen will lecture on the topic of: Why Survivors Speak? Ms. Kangisser Cohen will discuss what survival meant for the survivors, how their war-time experiences influenced their post-war lives, and what survivors hope to achieve by sharing their stories with others.

Tory candidate in Eglinton-Lawrence a first

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

The provincial riding of Eglinton-Lawrence will see a first in the next election, expected in the spring: An Orthodox Jewish woman candidate for office.

Corrine Korzen, a lawyer and former teacher with a background in business, will be acclaimed as the Progressive Conservative candidate in the riding when the Tories hold their nomination meeting later this month. Korzen is the sole person seeking to carry the PC banner.

Corrine Korzen

The riding, currently held by Liberal MPP Mike Colle, has a small Jewish population, but it includes the Bathurst-Lawrence area, with its high concentration of Orthodox residents, many of whom have become members of the federal Canadian Alliance.

Korzen and her husband are long-time members of Agudath Israel South, an Orthodox congregation in the heart of the riding. They have one married daughter.

She says a big issue among Jewish voters is the Equity in Education Tax Credit, introduced by the Tories, which provides long-awaited tax relief to parents of children in private, faith-based schools.

Liberal leader Dalton McGuinty, Korzen notes, has promised the do away with the popular credit should he form the next government.

"We are the only party that promotes the tax credit," she says.

Korzen, who lives in the riding, says she was encouraged to run by Thornhill Tory MPP Tina Molinari. She agrees that being Orthodox and a woman is probably a first at the provincial level, and says her Jewish values will stand her in good stead.

"I think Jewish voters want strong leadership," she says. "Their main areas of concern are the same for Jews and gentiles: health care, jobs, education and taxes. The Tory government has contributed millions of dollars to health programs [and] has created one million new jobs. The tax credit for private schools is totally a Tory platform."

She says McGuinty has voted against every tax cut introduced since 1995.

Voter anger at the federal Liberals' record on Israel, the controversy over the banning of Hezbollah and their stance at the United Nations has spilled over to their provincial counterparts, she believes.

"There's certainly been a backlash. [The federal Liberals] have an appalling record."

Korzen, a family law litigator, was called to the bar in 1978 after teaching high school English. She is director of the private Action Charitable Trust and has been a canvasser and team captain for the Canadian National Institute for the Blind.

Balancing security, human rights in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Even though Israel is a democracy, its fight against terrorism involves limiting human rights, said the dean of the University of Haifa's law school last week.

"It's not so simple," said Ariel Bendor, speaking to a group of lawyers at a lunchtime event at a downtown law firm.

One difficulty, he noted, was that "a significant proportion of the anti-terrorism fight takes place in the occupied territories. Israeli courts are not supposed to adjudicate them [although they have not been barred from doing so by the government]...It's accepted that the primary legal norms [in those areas] are those of international law."

Other issues that challenge the balance between human rights and security considerations include the legitimacy of interrogators' use of physical force on people suspected of terrorist activities, said Bendor.

Israel's supreme court has ruled against such measures where they are not authorized by law and the Knesset rejected the suggestion that it enact such a statute, Bendor said. "Apart from the moral dilemma, there is a fear that [such measures] would not comply with constitutional demands and inflict damage in the international arena." Bendor, who was accompanied by vice-dean Eli Salzberger and Yael Metser, vice-president, public relations and resource development for the university, was in Toronto and Montreal to meet with university supporters, and discuss academic exchanges with local law schools.

When asked by one of the lawyers about the response of Israeli academics to attempts to boycott Israeli academia, Salzberger noted that Israeli academics are generally liberal in their politics. "If there's one institution not to boycott, it's Israeli academia," he said. "Even if all the allegations were correct, the singling out of Israeli academia, not the Iraqi or Libyan universities, cannot be explained by anything but anti-Semitism."

What is noteworthy about the Haifa school, Salzberger told The CJN, is its Arab population. Of the 800 students at the law school, 20 per cent are Arab, and there are two Arab professors. "The miracle is that there's peaceful co-existence," said Salzberger. "There's a lot of debate, and civilized demonstrations. This is really the spirit of the city of Haifa."

He sees Arab Israelis like the ones at the university as a potential bridge between Israel and Arab leaders. "They appreciate many components of living in a democratic society."

Misrule of law, rule of chaos

Something bad is happening in Belgium. Naked anti-Israel sentiment seems to have taken hold of some parts of even the highest echelons of its judiciary as well as many of its parliamentarians. Last week, the Supreme Court of Belgium overturned a lower court decision that would have barred the charging and prosecution in Belgium of Israel's Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and senior members of Israel's defence forces and defence establishment for alleged war crimes and crimes against humanity arising from the slaughter by Christian Lebanese Phalangists of some 800 Palestinians in Sabra and Shatila in 1982.

As a result of the Belgian court's ruling, Sharon can be charged and brought to trial in Belgium once his tenure as prime minister of Israel is completed and his diplomatic immunity has lapsed. The other Israelis named in the dossier by the Palestinian complainants, according to the court ruling, can be charged and tried there immediately.

The effect of that ruling obviated the need for the amendment to the war crimes legislation that a legislative committee of Belgium's Parliament had introduced last month specifically to eliminate the need to establish some nexus between a prospective defendant and Belgian territory. It's very likely, however, that the Belgian Parliament will still proceed with the amendment, to ensure that all possible loose ends of the rope with which they want to snare Sharon will be tied up. Indeed, at the time the amendment was announced by the parliamentarians, the Belgian prime minister said he would not oppose it. There is little to suggest he has changed his mind.

The effect of the ruling also obviated the need for even the slightest pretense, on the part of Belgian decision-makers, of good faith. And that is a good thing because, obviously, there is none, and any attempt on their part to suggest the contrary would merely add contempt to conceit.

The underlying premise of the legislation is profoundly odious. It tries to raise Belgian law and the Belgian legislature above any other law and legislature on earth. It would attempt to charge and to try, in Belgium, for alleged war crimes and crimes against humanity committed anywhere on earth, at any time in the receding past, irrespective of the effective date of the legislation, any citizen of any country with or without any connection to Belgium or its citizens. It is a premise that offends the canons of the rule of law by which civilized, western democracies govern themselves. But clearly, respecting the canons of the rule of law is not as high a priority for the Belgians as is "getting the Israelis."

If every country were to follow Belgium's example, disguising politics as law and then placing that law above accepted international norms, there would soon be international legal chaos.

Something bad is indeed happening in Belgium. Canada and the western world should take notice and condemn it before it leads to something worse.

Membership in Conservative shuls

While I agree with much of Rabbi Steven Saltzman's article on intermarried families and the Conservative synagogue ("Conservative synagogues must limit membership to maintain Jewish continuity," CJN, Jan. 30), I find that some clarification for the public is necessary. Adath Israel's position is consistent with an official position produced by the Rabbinical Assembly's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards in 1963. Most Conservative congregations, however, base their affiliation practices on the majority decision written by the late Rabbi Max J. Routtenberg for the same Committee on Jewish Law and Standards. Following is one short excerpt regarding his responsum written by Rabbi Kassel Abelson in 1982:

"A Jew who intermarried is a transgressor of a Torahitic prohibition, but has not read himself out of the Jewish community. In other contexts, it was demonstrated that the Jewish community of the past was not anxious to read a Jew out of the fold for transgressing the commandments of the Torah. The desire to join a synagogue may properly be understood as an act of teshuvah and should be treated as such. At the same time, it is essential to maintain a posture of opposition to marriage between Jew and non-Jew.

"All efforts should be made to discourage intermarriages. However, if the marriage does take place, it is in the best interest of the Jewish community for the couple to become active in Jewish life and for the non-Jewish spouse to be converted to Judaism...

"We believe it is our duty to save a Jew, individually, for our people, by dealing with him with compassion and understanding, rather than with hostility or indifference. We ought to accept him in the congregation of our people and exert every effort to make his entire family feel that they would be welcome."

Every Jew should endeavour to bring people under the wings of Shechina even as Abraham did.

—Avot d'R.Nathan

Rabbi Steven Saltzman is shortsighted in his refusal to allow synagogue membership for intermarried couples and their families. He admits that "we cannot prevent intermarriage," but asserts that as less than one in 10 of the children of mixed marriages will identify as Jews they "do not represent a particularly good target group for community investment of scarce resources."

Does not the saying "If one saves a life, one saves an entire universe" apply here? Does not every Jewish person count? Is it not worth our investment to welcome each one into a Judaism that is inclusive and accepting? Exclusionary and discriminatory attitudes such as Rabbi Saltzman's alienate our young people from Judaism and contribute to our problems in Jewish continuity.

It is clear that Judaism is under threat in North America largely because the anti-Semitism of old is not politically acceptable, and, as has always been the case, Jews do intermarry into the larger group, and yes, sometimes they leave the faith. This has been a historical reality and is certainly reflected in the rich Jewish culture found throughout the Diaspora, as well as in the positive influence of Jews on the wider cultures of their adopted homelands. With intermarried couples, the ideal has been for the non-Jewish spouse to embrace Judaism, or at the least for the offspring to identify themselves as Jewish. Rabbi Saltzman would reject this reality, and transform his congregation into one that would shun other Jews – banish them, pretend that their belief is less than his ideal. This is morally repugnant.

Intermarriage starts with youth interdating. A simple, yet powerful way to combat interdating could be through the synagogue itself. The synagogue is the centre of community life, and would be a perfect place for young Jews to meet. Conservative and Reform synagogues have failed miserably in attracting young people to regular services. The synagogue is currently in grave danger of becoming an institutional relic.

Another institution that could be used to combat intermarriage is the Jewish day school. Yet affordable Jewish education is still a pipe dream.

It is easy to preach about the righteousness of banning intermarried couples, but what on earth is being done to prevent intermarriage? I know of countless young Jews who would love to find their Jewish "bashert," but do not know where to turn.

As a member of Adath Israel Congregation, I cannot endorse Rabbi Saltzman's policy.

I do not sanction intermarriage, but the message we send our children, by rejecting both the Jewish and non-Jewish spouse, and disenfranchising offspring of Jewish mothers who are by Halachah Jewish, is that we are intolerant and insular.

It is my contention that rather than closing the barn door after the horse has bolted, the synagogue can try to prevent intermarriage by providing a welcoming venue with relevant programs where young Jewish singles can meet.

Every time in Israel 'is like a first kiss'

By TIA GOLDENBERG
Special to The CJN

While most of my friends were out at a bar on New Year's Eve, I was in the middle of the Judean desert with 700 other Canadians. For me, New Year's Day consisted of a semi-drunken hike up Masada at 5 a.m.

As we waited for the sun to rise over the Dead Sea that morning, I drew a blank. I wasn't thinking about anything when the sun began to pierce the blue sky and bring in a new year. While most people around the world were either celebrating or reflecting upon the past year, I couldn't reflect on anything. I simply froze.

That's what Israel does to me. I've been there about 10 times, but every time is new. Every time is like a first kiss. I get nervous, but it's a nervousness that feels good and warms the heart.

As is obvious from my last name, I am Jewish. My parents are from Israel and most, if not all, my family lives there. I am not recounting my 10-day trip to preach my political views, nor to make claims on who I think is right or wrong. I am writing this as a plea for peace between Arab and Jewish students, not only in Israel, but also here in Canada.

These Grade 11 students from Hebrew Academy of Montreal were in Israel on the same Birthright program as the author.

Birthright Israel is a trip organized by various Jewish communities worldwide. It gives Jews who have never been to Israel a chance to see it for free. The Jewish community is pushing students to go now, partly because of the current conflict between the state of Israel and the Palestinians.

When I decided to go to Israel with Birthright, I knew about the conflict that had been raging for 2½ years. I knew Israeli soldiers were killing Palestinians and Palestinians were doing the same to Israeli civilians. That did not stop me from going.

I saw the pictures in the newspaper, the footage of suicide bombing victims crying for help. I also saw footage of Israeli tanks charging through Palestinian settlements. I saw, but I did not understand. My heart cries out every day for these victims, but this did not stop me from going.

The reaction from friends who heard I was going varied. Some asked me if I was crazy and if I knew what I was getting myself into. Others were blunter and told me to avoid the bombs. My favourite comment was "try not to get shot."

I boarded the plane in spite of the media and my friends. Most of the people I travelled with had never been to Israel.

One Friday night, the 25 people in my individual group got dressed up for Shabbat and walked to the Western Wall, Judaism's most holy site. It had just stopped raining and the cobblestone streets were glistening.

Most people on the trip with me considered this their most spiritual moment, although it was a little different for me, since I had had the experience before.

Before descending to the level where the Wall stands, we all leaned over a ledge overlooking it. We could see groups of people dancing and singing next to the wall. The rain started again, but they didn't stop. It was beautiful, but I had been to many Jewish weddings and had seen lots of singing and dancing and looked out further.

From the same ledge, I could see the golden Dome of the Rock beaming like a spotlight. The Dome contains the rock that marks the site from which the Islamic prophet Mohammed made his journey into the heavens and back to Mecca. It is the symbol of the oneness and continuity of the religions of Abraham, also known as the Jewish, Christian and Muslim faiths.

After making our way down to the Wall, I heard a sound unknown to me, a sound that at first seemed eerie. I asked someone what the cry was and he told me it was coming from a mosque near the Dome of the Rock. It was a call for Muslims, a call to come for prayer.

Of every moment on our trip, this one probably had the strongest effect on me. The longer it lasted, the less of an eerie cry it became. It was in complete harmony with what I was feeling – the sound added to the religious and peaceful atmosphere.

For a moment, hearing Jews sing and the Muslim prayer call as if they were one voice gave me hope. This hope stuck with me through the entire trip.

David Azerrad, 24, was also on this trip. He is completing his master's degree in political science at Carleton University. Although it was not his first time in Israel, he says the trip did something to him as well.

Two-and-a-half years ago, when the situation was slightly calmer, Azerrad believed Israel should do all it could, in order to attain a peace agreement. Nowadays he thinks differently. He says he came to a striking realization during his 10 days in Israel.

Azerrad says no matter how many papers he reads, no matter how many political science books he dissects, he can never know what it is like to be an Israeli, or a Palestinian, for that matter.

"As a Jew not actually living in Israel, I almost have no right to have an opinion. There's nothing for me to lose, nothing's at stake for me."

The night of the Tel Aviv bus station bombing, the 3,000 Birthright participants from around the globe were awaiting the arrival of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. He was to deliver a speech to us and was late.

The crowd grew impatient. The Argentine and Brazilian delegations began cheering for their respective homelands. The scene was reminiscent of a World Cup soccer game. Our Canadian delegation joined in with a slightly weak rendition of O Canada, but the maple leaf was flying high nonetheless.

The host of the event interrupted the frenzy. "I regret to inform you, but there has been a bombing in Tel Aviv," he said.

We were shocked. It was as if the bomb had gone off in the auditorium. It was silent for several minutes and I tried to absorb this reality. I couldn't believe we were oblivious to an explosion that had occurred only an hour away.

Despite my shock, I realized we were merely tourists. Palestinians and Israelis deal with the possibility of an attack daily.

In the auditorium, the awkward silence was interrupted. Someone started chanting "Israel! Israel!" over and over. The whole crowd joined him. Sharon finally arrived and we were silent. He spoke briefly and then departed for Tel Aviv.

I disagree with a lot of what is happening in Israel right now. I believe in the preservation of the State of Israel. I believe Palestinians are entitled to their own state. The means to both of these ends, however, must be reached peacefully. Unfortunately, the realist in me is not sure how feasible this is.

We were fortunate during our trip to spend three days with a group of eight Israeli soldiers to see what life could have been like for us if we had been brought up in a land plagued by so many wars. While we Canadians were from the University of Western Ontario or Ryerson or Carleton, the Israelis travelling with us hadn't even begun to think of university, not to mention careers.

These 20-year-olds knew how to shoot a gun. They were all in the air force and therefore knew either how to fly a plane or how to fix one. They carried guns with them wherever they went.

I had seen this before, but for those in my group who hadn't, it was a complete shock.

"People walking around in public with M-16 machine guns? I don't believe it!" I remember someone saying this before we left the airport.

People in Israel are very different from Canadians, Azerrad says.

"I saw something in the soldiers' eyes. I saw life.

"In Israel, people have something to fight for. I feel that as a North American, one has nothing left to die for. There is no sense of purpose here," he says.

I don't know if Azerrad is right, but his point is valid. Both Israelis and Palestinians have fury in their hearts. Yet despite this rage and the violence that accompanies it, civilians live regular lives, both in Israel and in the Palestinian territories.

Mike Arshinoff, 22, was in my group. It was his first time in Israel, although he has travelled to Australia, New Zealand and some of western Europe. He articulated a feeling shared by the whole group: "Even with all that has gone on there, the spirit of the people is higher than anywhere else I have been."

Tanks occupy the West Bank. Bombings occur, sometimes on an everyday basis. The point is: life goes on. I speak for myself as a tourist and for my family who lives there when I say that Israel is still as beautiful as she ever was.

My trip taught me some valuable lessons. I now know to never hike up a mountain on New Year's Day after drinking all night and not sleeping. Camels really do spit – a lot. I also learned the news media have a huge power over us and are capable of provoking any feeling in their audience. Finally, and probably most importantly, nationalism can kill, and in Israel, it quite often does.

As I try to settle back into school mode, I like to remember that sunrise atop Masada, when I couldn't think of anything at all. Life tends to be much simpler when you do that, when you can stop thinking and just be. From the summit of that mountain, I felt as though I could solve the world's problems. Unfortunately, I don't have the answers. What's more unfortunate is that I don't think anyone else does, either.

I hope to go back to Masada one day. I hope to go back and look out onto a new horizon, one that shines with peace and tolerance. But for now, I'll have to settle for a hypnotizing view of the Dead Sea.

Hurtful words

Jan. 19 was a fast day – Ta'anit dibbur – for some Jewish communities. Unlike our usual fast days, this one did not require an abstention from food and drink. Rather, it called for an avoidance of speech.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

God created the world with speech and our ability to speak inscribes our humanity. But words can be creative or destructive. Jewish norms often warn about lashon hara, evil or wrongful speech. So this fast day, by removing all words, removes those that are hurtful for one day. Responsible speech – an interesting concept.

Often news media focus on human wrongdoing. Rather than presenting evidence, we are told "so and so allegedly did… " or "some claim that…". How are we to accept these stories? Are they news and therefore true? Is this accurate or accountable reporting?

By reading, accepting and discussing these tidbits, have we been co-opted into a scheme of lashon hara? Without any proof, the person mentioned is maligned and their reputation destroyed.

Many agree with that old adage "Where there is smoke there is fire." More than distasteful, this expression is destructive. How can Jews think that way? We know best that a lie can be just that – a lie. Appearing in print does not make it true. Using the words "alleged" or "according to reliable sources" might release the news media from a civil suit but they do not exempt us from the warning of lashon hara. Every time we read and accept such unconfirmed reports, we engage in hurtful speech.

Anyone can be libelled or slandered in the news media. I myself was maligned in this newspaper many years ago. One person decided to call me a Jezebel, a woman who was leading our youngsters astray. I was shocked and distressed. I had done nothing wrong. After publication and upon my urging, a reporter asked the writer if they had ever met me, talked with me, read my work, or heard my lectures. "No," came the reply. "It was not necessary. I know what people like her think."

How can a newspaper print such stuff? What are we to do?

One friend – a man most honest and ethical – told me that he decided never to read this kind of gossip again. That kind of personal "fast," a voluntary refraining from reading hurtful words, seems like a fine idea. Not only will I not read, I will not perpetuate nor be party to that kind of base discourse. I will not willingly participate in the destruction of someone's reputation. If they are guilty, let the evidence tell the tale. Otherwise, let there be silence.

By the way, after that incident, I always had the perfect costume for Purim – Jezebel.

The Pianist

The story of Wladyslaw Szpilman, concert pianist and survivor of the Warsaw Ghetto, is a story of one man's struggle just to stay alive and of those who saved him. The recently released film The Pianist, based on Szpilman's experiences, challenged some of my deepest prejudices.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

What struck me about the film and the story may not be what others take away from it. Szpilman's story is so infused with irony and ambiguity that it cries out for a more subtle understanding.

But before we get to the pianist, let me tell you another story.

Years ago, I conducted my first interview for Vancouver's Holocaust Documentation Project with a Polish survivor whom I will call M. M's family was wiped out early in the German occupation of Poland. He figured he had nothing to lose and would go out fighting. What difference did it make if he lived or died? He joined the Polish partisans who had fled Warsaw and were hiding in the forests, and lived and fought there for over four years. Ironically, he had fallen in with one of the most viciously anti-Semitic groups. Speaking perfect Polish (that is, un-Jewishly accented), he fit right in. Conditions in the forest being as harsh as they were, he had no difficulty hiding the obvious sign of his Jewishness.

One day they met another group – there seem to have been many – and M recognized another Jew in their midst. Their eyes met once, and both knew, he told me, that to acknowledge the other might mean death. They went their separate ways. He survived the war and never told this story until I interviewed him. It stayed with me for years, blending in my mind with images of vicious anti-Jewish Poles waiting to ferret out the last Jew in Poland.

So what about Szpilman the pianist? Szpilman was saved, not by Jewish ghetto fighters, although they did help, but by a combination of the despised Jewish ghetto police, Polish anti-Nazi sympathizers and partisans and even a Nazi officer. Szpilman's story touched me deeply because so many people took risks for him, deciding in a split second that his life was worth as much as theirs.

> 'Human soul is a messy, contradictory place'

We all know the story of Oskar Schindler, a man who was a womanizer and opportunist (a mild way of describing his takeover of Jewish businesses). His decision to protect a list of Jews can only be explained by recognizing that the human soul is a messy, contradictory place where good and evil intentions jostle for supremacy.

So I admit that today, after seeing The Pianist, I am working through some deep prejudices that I have carried with me for many years. I had not been prejudiced against Polish-Canadians who played no part in this unhappy saga, but against Poles during the Holocaust who I assumed were all Nazi collaborators. As in so many things, Holocaust survivors have been my teachers.

The Nazi officer who rescued Szpilman was nothing like Schindler, yet his confrontation with Szpilman, too, will stay with me. The officer finds Szpilman, dirty, half-mad with hunger, desperate to open a can of food. Instead of shooting him on sight, the officer questions him: "What are you?" Szpilman answers: "I am – I was – a pianist." The officer, leading him to a piano: "Play." Szpilman thinks this is the last thing he will do – and he plays with abandon, summoning a reserve of power from his despair. Instead of shooting, the officer hides the ragged refugee until the Russians come. It is a powerful moment: prey and hunter face each other, and each recognizes the other's humanity.

After the liberation, Szpilman tries to find his Nazi rescuer. But it is too late. The Russians have captured him and he will die years later at the hands of the Communists.

If it is true that one who saves a single life is as if he saved a whole world, then those Poles who risked their own lives and that Nazi officer saved not just one concert pianist, but the world in a single soul.

Getting a click out of family

If you keep a free e-mail account long enough, it will eventually fill with a remarkable amount of drek (please excuse the technical jargon). Between the pitches for herbal viagra, ads for shady debt consolidation schemes and an astonishing number of notices about pornographic videos and Web sites, you can start to question the value of the Internet.

Stuart Slayen in Winnipeg

And the marketers are becoming increasingly clever in their efforts to get me to pause for a nanosecond before I delete the latest e-trash. Often, my own name appears in the recipient e-mail address. Sometimes, my name appears in the subject line. The sender wants me to think that the shmutz was produced especially for me.

So, when I saw a subject line last month that read, "Slayen Genealogical Research," I assumed that the sender wanted me to send him $50 in exchange for a photocopy of the page in the Winnipeg phone book where my name appears. I clicked anyway and waited indifferently while my dial-up connection wheezed. Within seconds, my indifference morphed into excitement.

This wasn't a scam. This was a note from Eran in Israel. A cousin I never knew I had. From a branch of the family that I knew nothing about.

My father and his two siblings passed on a number of years ago. Their mother died in the 1950s; their father, Abe Slayen, died in the 1940s. For whatever reason, I never knew much about the family's history other than the fact that my zaida's brother made his way to California after a short time in Winnipeg. I always knew the Slayen clan to be fairly small.

Not so, says Eran.

Eran tracked me down through my CJN-specific Hotmail address. The first notes were tentative until we figured out that we shared some of the same DNA. He spoke of his great- grandfather, Morduch, who had a brother named Avram-Yankiv. I knew immediately that Avram-Yankiv was the zaida Abe I never knew. Eran e-mailed a picture of Morduch, Abe and another brother, Simon. Not only did I recognize my grandfather in this photo taken in Belarus in 1910, I had seen it years ago in my parents' house.

> 'I feel connected to Jewish history in a way I never have'

As I looked at the scanned, creased image of three well-dressed but unsmiling men in White Russia taken nearly a century ago, sent by an Israeli just a few years younger than me, my world got very small.

Eran then filled me in briefly on our family history. The three brothers came from a town in Belarus whose name I won't reproduce here, lest I play Scrabble with any of you in the near future (this place is worth dozens of points). They came to Canada in 1913. One of them (my zaida) stayed; one went to California; and one, Eran's great-grandfather, returned to Europe. There were actually seven siblings, Eran told me. Four sisters stayed in Belarus. From what I have learned so far, most of the people in these women's families were wiped out by the Nazis in 1941.

Eran then e-mailed a family tree that he is compiling. It starts with his great-great grandmother, Mera Slayen, born in 1829. The day before opening that e-mail, I couldn't trace my family history much earlier than my own father's birth. Suddenly, I have a bond with a matriarch born nearly 200 years ago. It's a bond I share with the other names on the tree: Mordukh, Basya, Chana Geyna, Yosef, Ilya, Olga, Aron, Wolf, Nihama, Genady, Yael.

Since corresponding with Eran at the end of January, I feel connected to Jewish history in a way I never have. I'm thirsty for more knowledge. I want to know more about the 60 or so names on Eran's tree. I want to know where those who are living are living.

I want to help fill in the blanks. For on Eran's tree, just a couple of weeks ago, I was a blank, too.

Wahhabism and extremism go hand in hand

What fanaticism drove 19 Saudi – and Egyptian – hijackers on Sept. 11, 2001? In a word, Wahhabism – the puritanical, inward-looking, xenophobic, anti-Western variant of Islam that holds sway in Saudi Arabia today.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Wahhabism, the extremist and frightening face of Islam, is inextricably bound up and aligned with the House of Saud, the clan that rules Saudi Arabia like a family business. According to Stephen Schwartz, an American observer of Saudi Arabia, Wahhabism has, in effect, replaced communism as the main sponsor of international "ideological aggression" against the democratic West since the collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991.

Some will regard this as a questionable thesis. Are not the Saudis, their imperfections notwithstanding, friends of the United States? Are they not co-operating in the looming war against Iraq?

It is indeed true that Saudi Arabia, sitting on the world's largest proven reserves of oil, is an American ally and has been since the proclamation of Saudi independence in 1932.

But, as Schwartz demonstrates in The Two Faces of Islam (Random House), a chilling account of Saudi complicity in terrorism, the strain of Wahhabi Islam that nurtured Osama bin Laden and his ilk emerged long ago, in the mid-18th century.

No enemy of Islam, a religion he professes to respect, Schwartz claims that Wahhabism represents neither a majority of Muslims nor traditional Islamic values.

If contemporary Islam is malevolently identified with violence, intolerance and the implacable "Other," he suggests, it is due in no small part to Wahhabism. As he puts it: "I do not believe anything in Islam led intrinsically or inevitably to Sept. 11."

Schwartz's preferred model of Islam, found in present-day Turkey and the Balkans, is pluralistic and committed to co-existence with Judaism and Christianity.

On the other hand, Wahhabism, which he brands as "Islamofascism," is insular and basically antagonistic to co-existence. Worse still, Wahhabism exports its hateful, divisive message to the Muslim/Arab world and the United States as well.

The Saudis, in their oil-fuelled public relations campaigns, claim that they are a moderating force in the Middle East. In all fairness, this has been occasionally true. But the clique of spoiled princes who control Saudi Arabia cannot, in all honesty, deny that their alliance with, and dependence on, Wahhabism defines the very nature and essence of their country. The point is starkly illustrated by a story Schwartz relates.

Last April, Sheikh Saad al-Buraik – a leading Wahhabi cleric in Riyadh who once called for the enslavement of Jewish women in Israel and who referred to Jews as "monkeys" – was a member of an official Saudi delegation that visited President George W. Bush in Crawford, Texas. The delegation, led by Crown Prince Abdullah, included al-Buraik, a close associate of Prince Abdul Aziz bin Fahd, the youngest son of the ailing King Fahd. It strains credulity that Crown Prince Abdullah would have been unaware of al-Buraik's anti-Semitic rantings.

By any measure, al-Buraik and his kind are true representatives of Wahhabism, which was founded by Muhammad Ibn Abd al-Wahhab, born in the central Arabian region of Najd in 1703. Wahhab's austere vision of Islam, inspired by a narrow-minded 13th century legal scholar named Ibn Taymiyyah, was hailed as an original, authentic form of Islam. Wahhabism, whose spirit clashed with the free and individualistic traditions of the Arabs, is a form of totalitarianism that abhors concepts such as diversity and tolerance.

Wahhab, who dreamed of replacing the Ottoman caliph as the sole theological authority in Islam, formed a union with the Al Saud clan in 1747 based on a power-sharing accord. The Wahhabis would preside over religious affairs. The Sauds would take care of politics. Having agreed that power should be inherited exclusively by their descendants, the Sauds and the Wahhabis created a durable dynasty that persists to this day.

The families expanded their influence by the tip of the sword. By 1788, they controlled much of the Arabian Peninsula. In 1811, the Ottoman sultan, Mahmud II, dispatched the Albanian-born governor of Egypt, Muhammad Ali Pasha, to subdue the rampaging Wahhabis. Within a year, he liberated Mecca and Medina from their grasp. By 1818, he expelled them from Dariyah. But thanks to British assistance and protection, the Wahhabis held out in Jeddah. Britain's aid was a function of its imperialistic desire to break up and seize the vast Ottoman Empire.

Fighting back, the Wahhabis launched raids to regain what they had lost, and their fortunes waxed and waned from 1865 onward. But in 1924, after the fall of the Ottomans, they reconquered Mecca, setting the stage for their seizure of the entire peninsula. As absolute masters of Arabia, they established a system of governance based on a monopoly of wealth, ethnocentric Islam and political repression.

Wahhabism was and remains the backbone of the Saudi educational system. Last week, the American Jewish Committee released a report claiming that official Saudi textbooks teach students to hate the West and Christians and Jews.

The Saudis cemented their alliance with the United States in 1945, when President Franklin Roosevelt met with King Ibn Saud aboard the USS Quincy in Egypt's Great Bitter Lake. Roosevelt failed to gain Saud's approval for a Jewish state in Palestine. But the Saudi monarch agreed to form close economic relations with the United States based on oil.

Saudi Arabia supported the Arab war effort against Israel in 1948, but did not send troops to the front. In the 1967 and 1973 wars, however, the Saudis participated in the fighting.

Schwartz spills a considerable volume of ink to trace Saudi Arabia's support of Islamic extremism abroad. He begins in Afghanistan, which was taken over by the Taliban in the mid-1990s. Apart from Pakistan, Saudi Arabia was the only nation that officially recognized the harsh Taliban regime. Using Pakistan and the anti-Soviet struggle as a cover, the Saudis had already launched what he describes as "their most ambitious attempt to date at direct religious colonization of a Muslim country that was neither Arab nor a neighbor of Arabs."

King Ibn Saud

Throughout the Arab world, Saudi Arabia poured funds into religious schools – medresas – that were nothing more than incubators of Islamic radicalism. Saudi Arabia also tried to spread its influence in the Balkans, particularly in Bosnia and in Central Asian countries such as Tajikistan.

And by channelling funds to Hamas and permitting telethons to raise money for Palestinian "martyrs," the Saudis played an integral role in supporting suicide bombings in Israel, the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Schwartz also notes that the Saudis have carried out "a bloodless coup" in the American Muslim community.

He says they have financed the construction of mosques and forced American Muslims to follow Wahhabi theology and adhere to a strict Wahhabi curriculum in the training of imams. By his reckoning, John Walker Lindh, the infamous "American Taliban," was a graduate of such Wahhabi schools.

Citing two examples, Schwartz lambastes the Saudis for their reluctance to co-operate fully in the war against terrorism. They refused to investigate, freeze and seize the bank accounts of participants in, and contributors to, terrorist activities. They also refused to provide advance passenger lists of Saudi airline flights to the United States. Since the publication of this book, the Saudis, under intense U.S. pressure, have been somewhat more forthcoming. But their co-operation still leaves much to be desired.

Nor, he adds, have the Saudi authorities committed themselves to a full, transparent investigation of the 1996 Khobar Towers bombing, which killed 19 American servicemen and wounded 372. (American newspaper accounts at the time detailed Saudi reluctance to aid FBI agents posted to the case).

Schwartz believes the United States has not done enough to rein in the Saudis. In particular, he blames Dick Cheney, the current U.S. vice-president, for coddling them.

Comparisons can be invidious, but he claims that Saudi Arabia is a greater threat to the United States than Iran.

Compared to Saudi Arabia, Iran appears to be much more of an open society. Elections are held. There is a parliament, albeit with restricted powers. Women, though subjected to discriminatory edicts, are active in public life and are permitted to drive cars. There is a limited freedom of the press.

Schwartz is basically right, but his argument that Iran is less of an exporter of Islamic radicalism nevertheless seems overdrawn.

In any event, The Two Faces of Islam is a revealing and disturbing exposé of a country whose leaders have for too long concealed their unacceptable extremist beliefs behind a mask of soothing moderation.

Bar/Bat Mitzvah Celebration

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

The greatest day in the life of a Jewish boy or girl is the Bar/Bat Mitzvah celebration. Our Grade 7 curriculum includes a special Bar/Bat Mitzvah course. Students learn the meaning of becoming a Bar/Bat Mitzvah, prepare a D'var Torah, and undertake a Tzedaka project. The Bar/Bat Mitzvah Celebration is a day-long event that creates lifelong memories. The day begins with a celebratory tfilla (prayers), prominent Jewish guest speakers and a presentation to the selected charity. Each child receives a certificate of Bar/Bat Mitzvah and a special gift. Skits, music, food and speeches round out the memorable day.

The pitfalls of abolishing "custody" and "access"

Part Two of Two

In the Feb. 6 issue, we began to examine the impact on the resolution of disputes involving children in new legislation that would see the terms "custody" and "access" replaced by the term "parenting responsibility".

I suspect that the change in language, although endorsed by many lawyers, could be a well-intentioned mistake.

Pitfalls of abolishing the terms "custody" and "access"

Courts, lawyers, mediators and the Office of the Children's Lawyer who negotiate children settlements already have the tools to avoid such "winner" / "loser" scenarios and use them regularly. In divorces where there is not a high degree of conflict, such settlements often ignore the terms "custody" or "access", and have for several years. These terms are replaced with residential schedules and with detailed recipes for individual responsibility: day-to-day parenting tasks such as car pooling, synagogue attendance, medical appointments, professional development days, notice provisions if a parent wishes to move, etc...

But if Canada completely removes the option of using the terms "custody" and "access" from the legal lexicon, it ignores those few cases that are very "high conflict." Such situations require strict Court intervention and supervision to protect the child. In many extreme scenarios of violence between family members, child abductions, access denial and unrelenting daily fights, the Court needs to be empowered to use clear terms of demarcation and control that are easily recognized and permit quick enforcement. For this reason, a "custodial" parent's child can currently appeal to a foreign country to honour his or her custody order under an international treaty known as the Hague Convention. So long as the custodial parent has "custody" and "access", the Courts and enforcement authorities in that country can arrange to return the child to her as quickly as possible.

The Convention does not recognize the term "parental responsibility." Similarly, when Dad has "access" on Sundays between 12 noon and 3 p.m., no police officer needs to "interpret" the meaning of that Order. In many cases he can enforce the Order without the fear of being criticized or sued. Moreover, the Ontario Court of Appeal has reiterated in several cases that a parent who has been awarded "custody" shall normally be permitted to move away permanently, even if that means diminishing the rights of the "access" parent.

It may mean that the new law will make all those decisions less meaningful, since the term "custody" will no longer exist. Children/parents may wait a long time until new guidelines are created by the Courts, if any can be created at all.

Inadequacy of the term "parenting responsibility"

Eliminating the terms "custody" and "access" completely has been tried in the U.K., Australia and in many U.S. states, without any demonstrable success. In fact, many informed observers have deemed such abolition to be counter-productive in bringing about real improvements in collaborative parenting, while arguably creating confusion and problems of enforcement for both sexes.

In short, the new money for services is very welcome. In family law, it may well prove to be Minister Cauchon's greatest legacy (if the funding actually materializes.) However, the end of "custody" and "access" will likely generate greater uncertainty for many children in "high conflict" divorces — the very problem Minister Cauchon is attempting to solve.

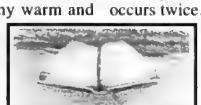
Time for some optimistic food for thought!

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN



Rabbinic Reflections

As I hear the wind howling outside and see the snow swirling in the window, I take little comfort in my warm and comfortable office environment. Soon I will have to venture back into the great freezing outdoors. Poetically speaking, living in peaceful Canadian serenity shouldn't necessarily afford us that much comfort as the dark clouds and stormy winds of war blow across the seas.

However, regardless of your personal level of comfort or concern, no fanciful stretch of imagination is needed to suggest that we all, as Jews and citizens of the free world, find ourselves living in a very fateful time.

"Timing," people say, "is everything." If there is any truth to that, the idea should provide us with an opportunity to replace the gloomy forecast with real hope and serious optimism instead. Allow me to explain.

For us, time is recorded in a rather unusual fashion. On one hand, we follow the lunar cycle and our months revolve around the moon. Yet our holidays, which are celebrated on appointed days in the Hebrew months, are seasonal, and thus it is the solar orbit that dictates our years.

This system is, however, intrinsically flawed, because 12 lunar months are more than 11 days short of the solar year. Enter the Jewish solution – a leap year, which rather than an extra day or two, means an extra month every few years. Consequently, the 12th month, Adar, occurs twice, once as Adar Rishon and a second time as Adar Sheni.

To be sure, each Hebrew month brings its own unique spiritual energy and dynamic. Regarding Adar, Jewish law states "Mishenichnas Adar marbim b'simchah." Freely translated, this means, "When [the month of] Adar arrives [one should endeavour to] increase [one's sense of] joy."

The Talmud refers to the month of Adar as "Hachodesh asher nehepach lahem," which means that in the Purim era, this was the month in which the tables were turned on our enemies, as their ill intentions against the Jews were transformed into their own undoing and downfall.

It is also considered to be the most mazaldik (a time of good omen, a propitious time for good things to happen) month in the Jewish calendar.

Adar apparently pulsates with good mazal, vibrant joyous energy and potential for positive transformation. Talk about timing.

Wait, it gets better. In the winter of 1992, our sainted mentor, the Lubavitcher Rebbe of righteous memory, imported to the "world of time" a fascinating concept from the laws of forbidden mixtures; i.e., the laws governing possible "contamination" of kosher foodstuff by un-kosher substances.

The Halachah states that if a questionable substance becomes fully integrated with kosher food that has 60 times more volume, the entire mixture remains acceptable as kosher! This idea is called batul bishishim, meaning (negative matter is) nullified by (the overwhelming quantity of) 60 times as much in volume.

The Rebbe went on to suggest that since, during a leap year, the days called Adar number 60 (when you include Shvat 30, which is the first day of Rosh Chodesh Adar), consequently they have the power to nullify negative vibes with their joyous and mazaldike energy. And since Adar's properties are those of transformation, this increment of time can readily transform the darkest of futures into illuminating brightness.

So take heart and smile; the timing couldn't be better. With additional Torah study, prayer and acts of kindness and compassion, we will hopefully change the course of time and once again re-experience Purim miracles and wonders. May we merit to be blessed with the light and gladness and joy and honour so vividly portrayed in Megillat Esther, and see the arrival of true peace upon earth with the coming of Mashiach speedily in our days!

Mencken was man of passion and paradox

The Skeptic: A Life of H. L Mencken*, by Terry Teachout, HarperCollins, 2002, $44.95.

Books
Bernard Baskin

In his heyday, H. L. Mencken was an American phenomenon: a social and literary critic, a lexicographer, intellectual gadfly, a controversial foe of religion, a popularizer of ideas and an irreverent pundit.

His astonishingly productive writing career included 19 books, thousands of articles, essays, and reviews and perhaps 100,000 letters while covering national politics for daily newspapers. He also edited The Smart Set and American Mercury, two magazines that helped define the Roaring Twenties. He did constant battle with American Puritanism in all its forms and skewered religious fundamentalists and dour prohibitionists.

A master of invective, Mencken railed unrestrainedly against the stupidity of the "Booboisie" – a term he invented that was widely accepted.

"The human race," he declared, "is divided into two sharply differentiated and mutually antagonistic classes, almost two genera– a small minority that plays with ideas and is capable of taking them in, and a vast majority that finds them painful, and it thus arrayed against them... The intellectual heritage of the race belongs to the minority, and to the minority only."

The author, Terry Teachout, concludes that Mencken was unarguably an anti-Semite. Charles Angoff, a young Jewish newspaperman who worked with Mencken, found his employer's attitudes toward Jews puzzling. On the one hand, Mencken published Jewish writers in the Mercury regularly, socialized with them constantly, and gave every indication of being fascinated by them.

"I can't understand how anybody can be an anti-Semite," Mencken once told Angoff. "I have never been to a Jewish home that didn't serve good grub, and I have never known a Jew who was a prohibitionist."

On the other hand, Angoff said, "He sometimes wrote about [Jews] as though some of them at least had personally harmed or offended him."

Interviewed at one point by a Jewish paper, Mencken declared, "I don't like religious Jews. I don't like religious Catholics and Protestants." His objection was to "professional Jews" who "go about like sandwich men carrying big signs: 'I am a Jew.' They parade it in front of you. They shout it into your face – not as an answer to a question, but aggressively, without solicitation... It's just like those Catholics clamouring that they are the only people who will go to heaven."

Publisher Joseph Epstein who had always defended Mencken, reversed himself when The Diary of H. L. Mencken was published in 1990. He wrote: "It is, alas, impossible any longer to let Mencken off the hook on the charge of anti-Semitism... For all his high spirits, his immense talent, his considerable intelligence, Mencken, when he felt himself cornered by events, decided to blame the Jews."

A dyed-in-the-wool Germanophile, Mencken opposed U. S. involvement in both world wars, and, early on, even wrote favourably of Germany under Hitler.

The author is unsparing in his recital of Mencken's failures, yet in the end he finds much to praise in Mencken's prose style – which is as pungent, fresh and vigorous as when he first set it down three quarters of a century ago.

Teachout is a splendid tour guide. He leads readers into the many-sided legacy of a creative and cantankerous personality, whose life was one of passion and paradox.

Chicken Soup & the Net - Pt. 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

No one, especially me, is going to try to convince you that your bubbie didn't teach you the best recipe for chicken soup. But if you are looking for something a bit different, there are plenty of suggestions from bubbies on the World Wide Web.

Let's begin with some traditional recipes. The Jewish Penicillin Exchange not only has wonderful recipes, it has tips on matzah balls and kneidlach. [http://gurlpages.com/uvula/soup.htm] The Jerusalem Post has several recipes including a "zingy" variation that doesn't spare the garlic (about 15 cloves.) [http://makeashorterlink.com/?A55E61623] George Erdosh claims his recipe "may have even improved on the flavour" of his mother's soup thanks to his knowledge of food science. You be the judge. [http://www.jewishmag.com/39mag/soup/soup.htm]

How about a bowl of murug? A favourite of Calcutta Jews, this Oriental chicken soup calls for ginger, turmeric and coriander and is served over rice. As the Jerusalem Post's Judy Montagu discovered "Some 200 years ago, as Jews moved from Basra and Aleppo, in Iraq and Syria, to Calcutta, they took along Middle Eastern foods, including murug, which then absorbed some Indian influences." [http://makeashorterlink.com/?C53522423]

Israeli food writer Daniel Rogov passes along several "sophisticated" chicken soup recipes. Representative of classic French haute cuisine, they include Consommé à la Lucullus, Lettuce Soup and Consommé à la Reine. He cautions that these recipes are not easy, but "when prepared well, each of these dishes is a mini-masterpiece that will have your guests sighing with joy." [http://www.stratsplace.com/rogov/sto ck_to_chicken_soup.html]

According to Katja Goldman and Arthur Boehm, "A good stock makes a world of difference to your cooking. By good I mean stock that is light but fully flavoured, not too sweet, and has a nice amber colour." Just like the one you'll find at this Web site. [http://www.allbaking.net/ch/bow/031799/empire.html]

Many people prepare a Shabbat cholent on Friday and let it stew overnight so they can enjoy a warm meal on Saturday afternoon. For something different, why not try chicken soup on Shabbat afternoon? The Just Crockpot Recipes Web site has more than 40 variations, including Country Crock, Thai and Poultry Bone Rice Soup. Many of these recipes suggest stewing times of five to 10 hours, so if you plan to leave your soup in a crockpot overnight, you may want to experiment during the week to see how much water to use. [http://www.justcrockpotrecipes.com/soupc/]

If you go browsing through the wonderful RFCJ Recipe Archive, you'll find no fewer than a dozen different variations including Cilantro, Drora's Spicy Yemenite and Canja (Brazilian-style). And since Purim is almost here, why not try the Persian Abgush-e-Gonde (chicken soup with chickpea meatballs.) [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=SOUPS]

The University of Utah Hillel, on the other hand, offers a "chicken soup" recipe that doesn't actually call for any chicken. [http://www.utah.edu/hillel/soup.htm]

Believe it or not, Jews don't have a monopoly on good chicken soups. Below are some variations that would make bubbie's head spin. (These international recipes are from a variety of Web sites, many of which are not intended for kosher palates. You will have to do some substitutions if dairy products are called for.)

There's Thai Coconut-Curry Chicken Soup, German Chicken and Cabbage Soup with Garlic Sausage [http://www.grandtimes.com/soup.html] and Korean Chicken Soup [http://www.recipeland.com/k/korean_chicken_soup.html]. West African Avocado soup calls for 2 ripe avocados, 4 cups of chicken broth, 2 tablespoons of lime juice and a 1/2 teaspoon of cayenne pepper. and it's served cold! [http://www.pepperfool.com/recipes/soups/avocado_soup_africa.html] For still more familiar and foreign recipes, visit the DMOZ Open Directory Project and its nearly 200 chicken soup recipes. [http://dmoz.org/Home/Cooking/Soups_and_Stews/Poultry/Chicken/]

Although I grew up in a traditional Ashkenazi home dining on my mother's perfect clear-chicken-soup-with-a-carrot, I'm not fazed by the variations I've encountered on the Web. But I must say that I never expected to see chicken and bananas in the same soup. But that's what Caribbean Chicken Soup with Bananas calls for – along with bell peppers, zucchini, white rice and a spice mix. [http://www.globalgourmet.com/food/egg/egg0396/carchck.html]

Whatever your preference, ess gezunterheit!

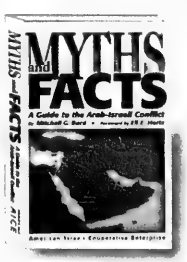
U.S. protected its interests in 1991 Gulf War

MYTH:

The 1991 Gulf War was fought for Israel.

FACT:



Prior to former U.S. president George Bush's announcement of Operation Desert Storm, critics of Israel claimed the Jewish state and its supporters were pushing Washington to start a war with Iraq to eliminate it as a military threat.

But Bush made the U.S. position clear in his speech on Aug. 2, 1990, saying that the United States has "long-standing vital interests" in the Persian Gulf. Moreover, he said, Iraq's "naked aggression" violated the UN charter.

Bush expressed concern for other small nations in the area as well as American citizens living or working in the region. "I view a fundamental responsibility of my presidency [as being] to protect American citizens" (Washington Post, Aug. 3, 1990).

Throughout the Gulf crisis, the president and other top administration officials made it clear that U.S. interests – primarily oil supplies – were threatened by the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait.

Most Americans agreed with the president's decision to go to war with Iraq. A Washington Post/ABC News poll on Jan. 16, 1991 found that 76 per cent of Americans approved of going to war and 22 per cent disapproved.

It is true that Israel viewed Iraq as a serious threat to its security given Iraq's leadership of the rejectionist camp. Israeli concerns proved correct when Iraq fired 39 Scud missiles at Israel's civilian population centres.

Israel has never asked American troops to fight its battles. Although Israeli forces were prepared to participate in the Gulf War, they did not because the United States asked them not to. Even after the provocation of the Scud missile attacks, Israel agreed to U.S. appeals not to respond.

Left has abandoned Israel, conference told

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel is being written off by much of the left and by some liberals as "the next South Africa," an American scholar told a University of Toronto conference on anti-Semitism last week.

Steven Zipperstein, co-director of the Taube Center for Jewish Studies at Stanford University, said polemical attacks on Israel are no longer only directed at its policies, but at its very existence.

"We now hear the most astonishing things about Israel."

Israel, he said, has become central to political deliberations on the left. "That Jews and Israel should loom so prominently after Sept. 11 cannot but startle."

In part, the left's preoccupation with Israel stems from its view that Jews are disproportionately influential and constitute "a disruptive element" in society, he said.

Still, he added, there is a need to distinguish between prejudice against Israel and prejudice against Jews.

If Israel is one of the world's most powerful nations, it is also one of its most vulnerable, Zipperstein said.

Meanwhile, the European left, having romanticized Third World people as bearers of progressive values, has adopted the Palestinian cause, Todd Endelman, a University of Michigan history professor, said.

"The role of the Palestinians in the imagination of the European left today was played previously by other progressive, freedom-loving peoples, including the Cubans, the Vietnamese, the Nicaraguans and the Chinese."

Noting that traditional anti-Semitism has merged with a hatred of Israel, Endelman drew a distinction between anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism. Legitimate criticism of Israeli policies cannot be equated with anti-Zionism. The latter, he said, is a function of sloppy thinking.

But when Israel's existence is questioned and it is singled out, a line is crossed and rational debate takes second place to anti-Semitic fantasy, he said.

Critics of Israel expose themselves as anti-Semites when they say it is a racist state and that its occupation of the West Bank and Gaza can be compared to the Nazis in Europe, Endelman said.

"This kind of inflammatory language is a dead giveaway of anti-Semitism."

Wondering why European intellectuals are obsessed with Israel, he rhetorically asked why they are so relatively indifferent to Syria's occupation of Lebanon or India's occupation of Kashmir.

"Why this double standard?"

Endelman said right-wing supporters of Israel who refuse to acknowledge Palestinian rights provide ammunition to anti-Semites.

Contrary to the hopes of early Zionists, Israel's establishment has not eliminated anti-Semitism, he said. Zionist thinkers, he said, underestimated the enduring strength of Christian stigmatization of, and contempt, for Jews.

Israel is also vilified because of its close relations with the United States, Endelman said. "If the United States is evil, then by extension Israel is evil."

Morton Weinfeld, a McGill University sociologist, said anti-Zionism provides "a certain amount of intellectual cover" to terrorists.

Pernicious anti-Zionism denies the Jewish people the fundamental right to national sovereignty and singles out Jews for exceptional treatment, he said.

It feeds into the world view of anti-Semites, and "in its logic, leads to politicide and, potentially, to the genocide of Israeli Jews," he warned.

Like any other country, Israel deserves to be criticized, Weinfeld said. But there is a "tipping point" after which criticism descends into outright rejection of Israel.

ANTISEMITISM:
THE POLITICIZATION OF PREJUDICE IN THE CONTEMPORARY WORLD

Weinfeld, who described himself as a Peace Now supporter, said liberal Jewish supporters of Israel are becoming increasingly isolated, as the left has virtually abandoned Israel and Christian fundamentalists have filled the gap.

Derek Penslar, director of U of T's Jewish studies program, said much of Arab anti-Semitism today is "Palestinian-centric," but radical Muslim anti-Semitism draws on more traditional sources.

Contemporary Arab anti-Semitism, he said, is fuelled by realities on the ground, such as Israeli communities in the disputed territories.

Early Arab opposition to Zionism was not based on anti-Semitism, Penslar said, but on fears of displacement by newly arrived European Jewish settlers.

In general, Arabs recognize Israel is here to stay and are prepared to make peace, said Mark Tessler, a University of Michigan political scientist who has lived in the Middle East.

"Most Arabs are prepared for an accommodation based on a two-state solution."

But there is much anger in the Arab world over Israel's policies toward the Palestinians, its alliance with the United States and the belief it is not really interested in peace, Tessler said.

Many Arabs believe Israel is laying the foundation for a permanent occupation of the West Bank and Gaza, he said.

Arabs who invoke Islam to reject Israel are in a minority, he has found. "It's not fundamentally about religion."

Groups such as Hamas thrive when conditions deteriorate. He estimates that Hamas has the allegiance of 14 per cent of Palestinians in the territories.

'Holocaust has not swept away anti-Semitic feelings'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A new strain of anti-Semitism has infected Western Europe, an American historian says.

Although it does not threaten the safety and prosperity of Jews as individuals, it renders Jews vulnerable on the "collective level," Todd Endelman told a University of Toronto conference on anti-Semitism last week.

The new anti-Semitism, which incorporates elements of classical anti-Semitism, does not block Jewish social and economic mobility, he said. Educated middle-class Jews are professionally successful and socially integrated and no longer need to convert to Christianity to advance in society.

Yet Jews feel more hostility now than a decade ago, said Endelman, who teaches at the University of Michigan.

This animus, linked in part to the perception that Jews are more loyal to Israel than their host countries, manifests itself in attacks against Jewish property and in verbal violence.

Expressions of hostility have even appeared in the liberal media, and the "chattering classes" have no compunction about deploying "classic anti-Jewish tropes," Endelman said.

The nature of anti-Semitism has changed, he said.

"Before World War II, the right rather than the left was the paramount source of hatred and contempt for European Jews.

"This is no longer true. On the right, anti-Semitism no longer functions as a cultural code or a rallying cry, while on the left, it has become entangled with and draws energy from... anti-Americanism, Third Worldism and the anti-globalization campaign."

Radical Muslims have joined the anti-Semitic chorus, re-activating forms of anti-Jewish behaviour that was once the preserve of rightists, he said.

In France, for example, disaffected Muslim youth have been responsible for most of the recent anti-Semitic assaults, and in many French secular schools, courses about the Holocaust have been dropped due to Muslim opposition.

ANTISEMITISM:
THE POLITICIZATION OF PREJUDICE IN THE CONTEMPORARY WORLD

Endelman said there are other critical differences between pre-World War II European anti-Semitism and anti-Semitism today.

Political parties with parliamentary representation no longer want to strip Jews of their civil rights, and anti-Semitism is not tied to a package of anti-liberal attitudes. Furthermore, the so-called "Jewish question" has ceased being a central issue, Endelman said.

Nonetheless, he warned, the Holocaust has not swept away anti-Semitic feelings, myths and tropes, which remain deeply embedded in high and low cultures and can easily be mobilized.

Endelman said Europeans who are ill-disposed toward Jews want to turn the tables on Christian guilt about responsibility for the Holocaust so they can "liberate" themselves and speak their minds openly about Jews.

Christian intolerance of Jews and the failure of emancipation led to a need for a Jewish state. But now Jews are excoriated for having achieved statehood, he said. "The Jews are damned if they do and damned if they don't."

Michael Marrus, a historian and U of T's dean of graduate studies, said there is little evidence to suggest the recent escalation of anti-Semitic incidents in France corresponds to a fundamental shift in French attitudes toward Jews.

Against the backdrop of a decline in traditional French anti-Semitism, he said surveys suggest Jews are increasingly accepted as equal citizens. But, he added, about one third of respondents believe Jews possess too much power.

Marrus ascribed the upsurge in anti-Semitism to French Muslims.

Concerning anti-Semitic incidents, he compared the "lackadaisical response" of France's previous Socialist government to the "vigorous response" of the current right-of-centre government.

Turning to the Holocaust, his field of study, Marrus said there is no way to measure whether Europeans really feel guilty about that event.

Robert-Jan Van Pelt, a professor of architecture at the University of Waterloo and an authority on Auschwitz, criticized Berlin's police chief for having recently advised Jews not to wear yarmulkes in public, saying it "shows that Europeans can do better."

Steven Zipperstein, a professor of Jewish culture and history at Stanford University, focused on the infamous anti-Semitic tract, The Protocols of the Elders of Zion, a Czarist forgery he called ridiculous, illogical and discredited.

Since Sept. 11, the Protocols – the world's most widely circulated book next to the Bible – has enjoyed a revival, and is now posted on 15,000 Web sites. "It can't be dismissed as just silly anymore."

Peter Solomon Jr., director of U of T's Centre for Russian and East European Studies, said the ideas in the Protocols are alive and well in modern Russia. Although post-Soviet governments don't discriminate against Jews, and most Russians do not condone anti-Semitic attacks, anti-Semitic stereotypes are common in Russia, he said.

The enforcement of anti-racist laws has been erratic and capricious in Russia, Solomon said, and very few anti-Semitic publications have been closed in the past two years.

Extending a shoulder in difficult times

A first-hand look at Israel's social service crisis

by Haim Feingold
Executive Director, Orr Shalom Group Homes

Greetings to all of Orr Shalom's friends in Israel and around the world.

Many of you have been asking me tough questions lately on the events in the country.

Haim Feingold

It is hard for me to answer you without entering into the intricacies of local politics, but even if I talk politics – I do not have good answers.

The economic crisis is deepening. Social polarization is worsening. And almost no one addressed this in the election campaign.

As though a people's fortitude depends only on weapons or the power that they should or should not direct towards their enemies and foes.

(Just a few hours ago, the Ministry of Welfare informed us that due to a sharp decrease in tax collection it will only transfer 80% of its monthly payments to social services like us. And this is only a week after the elections…)

And it is not only for you, my friends, that I have no answers. When my son Daniel joined the army, I was very frustrated. When I was a soldier (in fact – strangely enough, I am a soldier to this day), and went time after time to terrible wars, I dreamed that my son would not have to do so. That he would get through his military service peacefully.

Not only is there no peace for Daniel and his soldier friends, but in a month, he will be released into a reality of deep recession and unemployment.

Not only is the present difficult, but the future also seems murky and unclear.

If it is difficult for Daniel, despite having the firm backing of a home and loving family, how will Michal who is presently finishing her military service feel. Orr Shalom has been her only home since the age of eight.

Two of the young children of Orr Shalom.

In the State of Israel's highly complex reality, our life in Orr Shalom becomes even more complex. On the one hand, unemployment and need trouble Israeli society more than ever before (besides, perhaps, in the early years of the State). Over a million people in Israel currently live beneath the poverty line, according to updated figures from the Central Bureau of Statistics. On the other hand, the State and the welfare authorities do not have money to fund the increasing number of children who cannot live with their biological parents any more, and need a family group home or another kind of residential facility. The welfare services barely succeed in preserving what already exists.

We should bear in mind that hunger is not just for food. Education has been hit hard, budgets for culture are gradually shrinking, and more then ever, people are losing their homes. It is difficult.

The traumas that we have all undergone over the past two years surrounding the Intifada, do not just require ambulances, operating rooms and trauma wards, funded by emergency appeals. What we lack is whatever will grant society as a whole the social, economic and psychological endurance to cope until victory.

It is you, our friends and supporters from around the world, who understand this and extend a shoulder in these difficult times as well. A shoulder that we could not manage without.

And we are here, in the midst of our people, sensitive to the difficulties of the hour. We are trying to cope with them on several fronts:

First of all, we are counting the money over and over, calculating and re-calculating every expense. We finished the previous fiscal year (2002) without any debt or deficit!! In Israel's present economic reality, this is nearly a miracle, and a necessary condition for survival. Cautiously and with much thought, we continue to develop new frameworks for children in need. We cannot shut ourselves away in our bubble, only looking after our children, and not hearing the distress of the surroundings.

In addition, we are increasingly engaged in counseling, guidance and instruction for other therapeutic and social programs. We try to share the knowledge and experience we have gained with other organizations. We believe that everything we know, all the experience we have gained through much work and effort, belongs to everyone, and everyone is welcome to learn from it.

The future of Israeli society is not self-evident. Only fortitude and honesty will bring us to safe shores. And I allow myself to promise, with all due modesty, that with your help, the Orr Shalom association will continue to stand at the forefront of the battle for justice and social fortitude in Israeli society.

Ilan Ramon, the first Israeli astronaut, who died just a few days ago when the Columbia failed to return safely said one morning when he woke up high above us, that Israel, and the whole world looks so small and simple from so far above. I know that if people with warm hearts like yours had a bigger say in life, the whole world would be a nicer and simpler place.

Orr Shalom, supported in part by UJA Federation, is a non-profit organization operating a network of family group homes for children who have suffered abuse or neglect. Part of the proceeds from UJA Federation's Campaign 2003 will be allocated to ease the burden on Israel's social service system.

A Toronto mother's "labour" of love

In August 2002, Torontonian Elissa Reiken gave birth to her first child, a beautiful girl named Lexie. With Lexie's birth, a new idea was also given life, an idea that will benefit hundreds of newborns and their parents.

Loot With Love, is a "labour of love" for the 28-year-old Reiken, a teacher at Toronto's Steelesview Public School.

As a new mom, Reiken began to receive the regular array of baby gifts from friends and family. However, before long, Reiken's home began to resemble the Baby Gap as the gifts just kept coming and coming.

"When my daughter was born a few months ago I received an overwhelming amount of gifts with which to welcome her into the world. I got gifts from friends and family, along with gifts from my students and my husband's business associates," she says. "It became so overwhelming that the bathtub in our basement is storage for my collection from other women."

Reiken eventually saw a purpose for her newfound riches and decided to use her maternity leave to perform some serious mitzvah work by getting these goods to new moms less fortunate than herself.

"In the first week of motherhood, I made a promise to myself – that I would donate whatever baby goods came into my home that I did not want or need, to new moms who needed them more," she says.

Reiken will spend her time off making gift bags and dropping them off at Jewish Family & Child Service – a beneficiary agency of UJA Federation, and various women's shelters.

"I would like each gift bag to include at least a book, a toy, diapers, formula, a bottle, and a nice outfit," says the maternal entrepreneur. "I want to help other mothers enjoy this time in their lives to the fullest."

So far, with the help of a healthy network of friends and via e-mail, word has been spread to over 300 people, and more than 40 new moms have already contributed.

"What we're really looking for from people are new baby products such as clothing, diapers, formula, bottles, pacifiers, toys, books, stuffed animals, that sort of thing," says Reiken.

Elissa's husband, Andy, 32, is very impressed with his wife's efforts. "I am so proud of Elissa," he says. "She came up with this idea and our Jewish community has responded in an overwhelming manner. I think Lexie would have to say, 'mom and dad, you brought me into a great world.'"

To make donations to Loot With Love, there is a drop box at Forest Hill Real Estate (1688 Avenue Rd., south of Fairlawn), or donors can contact Les Aaron at 416.785.1500 or Elissa directly at elissareiken@hotmail.com.

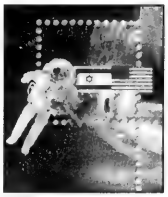
Memorial fund created for Israel's first astronaut



UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is setting up a memorial fund in the name of Col. Ilan Ramon, Israel's first astronaut, who perished the morning of February 1st along with six crewmates aboard the space shuttle Columbia.

UJA Federation is currently in contact with the family of Col. Ramon to decide exactly how donations will be disbursed.

Prior to setting up the memorial fund, UJA Federation issued the following statement regarding the tragedy.

"In shock and with extreme and profound sadness, we at UJA Federation offer our deepest sympathies to the loved ones of the seven brave voyagers aboard the space shuttle Columbia," said Ralph Shedletsky, Chair of UJA Federation's Board of Directors. "We share our grief with the people of Israel, whose son Ilan Ramon, a colonel in the Israeli Air Force, and the first Israeli astronaut, was one of those who perished. The seven astronauts so tragically lost represent the very best of us, and the very best within us."

Two senior Jewish Federation officials recently spent time with Colonel Ramon. Yossi Tanuri, UJA Federation's Israeli emissary, recalls a conversation he had with him in November. "It was a privilege to meet him, and to speak with him," recalls Tanuri. "He told me how much it meant to him to be the first Israeli to go into space and to hopefully spend a Shabbat up there. He knew how much this mission would mean to all of Israel, and to Jews everywhere. Ironically, he told me that he had no fear at all – except one – that this mission would be delayed yet again. Of course, we all know what happened from there."

UIA Federations Canada Executive Vice President, Maxyne Finkelstein, remembered her meeting with Ramon while looking at a signed postcard he had given her.

"I have never asked for anybody's autograph in my life, until I met Col. Ramon," says Finklestein. "He was such a warm, friendly, compassionate man, someone who instantly made you feel like a friend. You could see in his eyes the passion he had about going into space – not for himself, but for Israel. He is truly a hero."

Col. Ilan Ramon

A few years ago, as he prepared for his mission – one that was delayed for roughly three years – Col. Ramon told a UJA Federation audience in Toronto about what he hoped would come from his eventual flight to outer space.

"I will be representing more than just the State of Israel," Ramon told the audience. "I will try to transfer to space the unity of the Jewish people, from Israel and the rest of the world. I represent the entire Jewish people."

To make donations to the Ilan Ramon Memorial Fund, please contact Michelle Spring at UJA Federation either by telephone, 416-631-5685; or by sending a donation to the Ilan Ramon Memorial Fund c/o UJA Federation, 4600 Bathurst Street, Toronto, Ontario. Holocaust Centre of Toronto names new Director

Adam Fuerstenberg

Adam Fuerstenberg, recently named the new Director of UJA Federation's Holocaust Centre of Toronto, promises to do everything possible to maintain the memory of Holocaust survivors. As a child survivor, he considers his role to be a sacred duty.

"I believe that, as both a survivor as well as a life-long educator, I have a personal stake in the dual mission of the Centre, its commemorative and educational role in Toronto and Ontario," says Fuerstenberg, Professor Emeritus at Ryerson University, who succeeds Dr. Carol Anne Reed as director of the Holocaust Centre. Born in Radom, Poland, he arrived in Montreal as a refugee in 1951. Professor Fuerstenberg, an authority on Canadian, Jewish and Yiddish literature, founded the Canadian Jewish Book Awards and is the editor of Parchment, Canada's prize-winning journal of Jewish creative writing.

For more than a decade, the Holocaust Centre has been dedicated to the memory of the six million Jews murdered during the Holocaust. Since its doors opened, more than half a million visitors from the U.S., the Caribbean, Europe, the Middle East, Asia, Australia, and South Africa, and 200,000 students from across Canada have visited the centre

Fuerstenberg, who until recently served as Director of UJA Federation's Committee for Yiddish, believes that the Centre's excellent outreach programs to community schools, and its renowned Holocaust Education Week, are examples of its important role in reminding the community of the horrors and the causes of the Holocaust.

The new Director has set some lofty goals, and at the root of his vision lies one common denominator - young people - about whom Fuerstenberg is very passionate. "We simply must make a greater effort to involve young people in the Centre's activities," he says.

Fuerstenberg feels that while the Centre's programs bring over 20,000 high school students through its doors each year, it's just the beginning.

"Why not explore the possibility of creating a travelling Holocaust exhibition, including volunteer docents, which would visit smaller cities in Ontario?" he asks. "We could set up a display in the local Jewish community centre, synagogue, church, perhaps even a high school. While 20,000 kids is an impressive number, it is still only a small fraction of Ontario's high school student body."

"Becoming Director of the Centre is an extension of my work with Yiddish," he says. "In helping to preserve Yiddish, the language and culture of most of the Holocaust victims, we are also striving to strengthen the Jewish community by remembering who we are and the great sacrifices we have endured. That is - above all else - the purpose of the Holocaust Centre of Toronto."

UJA Federation Israel missions continue to fly

Despite the threat of a U.S.-Iraqi war, UJA Federation is readying itself to send yet another solidarity mission to Israel, the 30th mission since October, 2000.

The joint UJA Federation-Mizrachi solidarity mission, chaired by Sam Moskowitz, is set to take off from February 23 until March 2, despite the ongoing tensions.

"We have not had even one cancellation so far," says Jack Kahn, President of the Mizrachi Organization of Canada. "In fact, people continue to call and come aboard what should be an incredible experience."

The current roster of participants from Toronto stands at an impressive 60 while another 65 from Mizrachi's sister organization, Emunah Women of Canada, will meet the Toronto contingent for one day in Israel.

"We have taken all of the necessary precautions and we are constantly in touch with Israeli authorities who have assured us that we will be well taken care of," says Kahn.

"It's absolutely vital that we go to Israel now, more than ever," says Sam Moskowitz, whose son Brian, 24, is in the Israeli army. "We must continue to show our support and love for Israel and for Israelis. We can't just stop going there because of tensions. There have always been tensions and the threat of war. We just need to keep going to lend support."

Among stops on the mission will be a tour of the trauma unit at Shaare Tzedec Hospital in Jerusalem. Mission participants will also meet with members of ZAKA, the volunteer organization whose members search sites of terrorist attacks for severed body parts so they can be buried in full accordance with Jewish tradition.

Over the winter holidays, more than 100 UJA Federation mission participants chose to spend some quality time with the people of Israel, particularly in Eilat/Eilot – the region that is twinned with Toronto under the Jewish Agency's Partnership 2000 (P2K) program.

Introduced in 1987, P2K directs a portion of funds raised through UJA Federation's annual campaign toward educational, social and therapeutic projects in Eilat/Eilot. P2K also represents the concept of Gesher Chai (a "living bridge") designed to develop connections between the people of Eilat/Eilot and Toronto's Jewish community.

The UJA Federation Family Mission left Toronto on December 22 for 10 days of education, and great memories starting in Jerusalem, before moving to the P2K region.

"The mission was a tremendous success," says Sarah Perlis, chair with Bev Lyons. "Everyone - old and young alike - got along so well. These were people who came together for Israel, who recognized the need was there to go to Israel for their holidays, instead of their regular destinations. I think everybody saw that need once they got there, and they certainly felt the connection with Israel."

Another UJA sponsored mission to Israel was the recent Temple Kol Ami Family Mission, which was completely P2K-centred.

Israel Advocacy was the focus of a winter break experience for 50 university students involved with Hillel of Greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services).

Starting in Jerusalem where the group participated in seminars focusing on campus-related issues, the students were then joined by another Toronto young adult delegation with which they drove to Eilat for a five-day stay.

Day, Grafstein critical of Liberal policy on Israel

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Turning the conventional Mideast "land-for-peace" formula on its head, Canadian Alliance foreign affairs critic Stockwell Day advised Israel not to cede further territory in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip until it signs a peace treaty with the Palestinians.

Appearing at a recent Holy Blossom Temple forum on Canadian foreign policy in the Middle East, Day suggested that Israel should instead adopt a "peace-for-land" approach.

In addition, Day, the former Alliance leader, criticized Canada for failing to take a "leadership position" in the current crisis over Iraq.

Jerry Grafstein, a Liberal senator and fellow panelist, was also critical of Canadian policy, declaring that Jewish communities in the West Bank and Gaza are neither contrary to international law nor an "impediment" to a peaceful solution between Israel and the Palestinians.

Grafstein, however, urged both sides to desist from "unilateral acts," which may well undermine negotiations.

On Iraq, he said he agrees with British Prime Minister Tony Blair's policy rather than with Canadian Prime Minister Jean Chrétien's position.

Britain, unlike Canada, has expressed unwavering support for the United States, which seeks to disarm Iraq of weapons of mass destruction and effect regime change in Baghdad.

The third panelist, Rick Salutin, a Globe and Mail columnist, described Israel's occupation of the territories as "unjust" and "self-destroying," and said a U.S. invasion of Iraq would be a "bad idea" and won't stop international terrorists.

Fresh from a trip to Israel, a visit he called a "wonderful experience," Day said he was none too pleased by the "disturbing policy positions" Canada has taken at the United Nations on Arab-Israeli issues.

He did not elaborate, but pointed out that the UN General Assembly has passed more than 400 resolutions against Israel since the 1967 Six Day War.

To a ripple of applause, Day said Canadian parliamentarians should debate UN resolutions before they actually reach the floor of the UN.

Day warned the UN that its recent decision to appoint Libya chair of its human rights committee was a disappointing development. "We don't want to see the UN lose its relevance."

In two more crowd-pleasing statements, Day said Ottawa should have banned Hezbollah's political wing long ago, and it should have rebuked Lebanon's ambassador to Canada for suggesting that Canada's media is controlled by Jews.

In another broadside, Day lambasted CBC TV for not labelling Palestinians who engage in terrorism as "terrorists." It is a "morally bankrupt policy," he said.

Day urged Ottawa to ensure that Canadian humanitarian aid to the Palestinian Authority (PA) is not "skimmed off" by corrupt Palestinian leaders.

Blasting the PA, he charged it is in "material breach" of its Oslo accords obligations, given its record of incitement against Israel.

Turning to Iraq, Day said he cannot understand why Chrétien has not staked out "a clear position." As he put it, "It's not a good thing to leave our allies in doubt."

In the House of Commons, the Alliance has urged Canada to support an American-led coalition to depose Saddam.

Day, who recently returned from a trip to Washington, D.C., warned that Canada is becoming increasingly "marginalized and irrelevant" over Iraq.

"Sometimes, you have to take leadership positions, and Canada has to do that. Canada must come up with a decision."

Saddam, he said, only understands military power.

Day predicted that a war in Iraq will be relatively short and will achieve its objective. "Saddam will no longer be viable," he said, adding that regime change is not "a bad idea."

Calling the Arab-Israeli conflict "one of the most intractable problems" of the last century, Grafstein cast doubt on the prospects for peace should the PA refuse to reform itself.

Stockwell Day

Nevertheless, he expressed optimism that the Mideast is moving in the "right direction."

He cited several examples. Terrorism as a tactic has become discredited, he said, and in surveys, most Palestinians believe that non-violent means are the best route to peace. As well, Grafstein noted, Saudi Arabia has announced its intention to democratize itself.

"When democracy is on the march, there will be peace in the Middle East."

Grafstein confessed he does not know what kind of an Iraqi policy Canada will eventually announce.

"We haven't had a good debate on Iraq," he remarked. "We have to get Canadian public opinion moving in the right direction, and we need leadership from our elite."

Grafstein, who was appointed to the Senate by former prime minister Pierre Trudeau, said Canada runs the risk of inadvertently helping Saddam unless it joins "a common front" against him.

The principles of Canadian foreign policy, he observed, are based on, among other things, national unity, political liberty, the rule of law and responsible government and Judeo-Christian values.

Canada, he said, has played a direct or indirect role in Middle East peacemaking since the 1919 Versailles conference in Paris. He cited Canada's support of the 1917 Balfour Declaration and of the 1947 Palestine partition plan.

Canada, he said, is committed to a two-state solution to defuse Israel's dispute with the Palestinians.

Salutin challenged two "myths" – that the Arab world was never interested in making peace with Israel, and that Israel's offer to the Palestinians at the 2000 Camp David was "generous."

Salutin, a former Bible student at Holy Blossom, said critics of Israeli policy should not be required to prove they are not anti-Semitic. Describing Zionism as a "historically great epic of Jewish nationalism," Salutin said he has always identified himself as a Jew.

The moderator was Irshad Manji, a Toronto Muslim television host.

New Clanton Park rabbi admires community's 'old world values'

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Clanton Park Synagogue's new spiritual leader, Rabbi Yehoshua Weber, says he is delighted to be in Toronto.

"Toronto is a unique Jewish community," he told The CJN in a recent interview. "It manages to maintain the old world values of family relationships, communal responsibility and civility. It still has a strong European flavour."

Rabbi Weber succeeds Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, who remains active in communal work, most notably as chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashrut.

New York-born Rabbi Weber, 38, received smichah at Yeshiva Chaim Berlin and a BA from Touro College, both in New York City. He has also done graduate studies in Jewish studies at Yeshiva University.

He began his rabbinic career at Young Israel of Canarsie in Brooklyn, N.Y., and for more than six years he was rabbi of Young Israel of Windsor Park in Queens. At the same time, he taught at the girls' high school of Yeshiva University.

When his Windsor Park congregation became, as he delicately put it "demographically challenged," he and his wife, Leah, a special education teacher, looked around for a position in which they could truly establish themselves.

"Toronto seems to suit all our needs," he said.

The city has a sense of communal cohesion, all the way from the right to the left, both religiously and ideologically, something that is not seen as much in New York, Rabbi Weber said.

This cohesion is reflected at Clanton Park synagogue, he said, where not only do Jews with different levels of observance and background work, study and pray together, they "even marry each other."

He said it's also wonderful to see how different generations come together at the shul – grandfathers, fathers and kids. "And there is so much kovod [respect] between them."

This is not nearly as common in New York, the rabbi said.

That is not to say that there is no disagreement in the congregation, he said, but it is expressed within the appropriate framework.

While the rabbi plans to eventually become more involved with the community – he has already attended several meetings of the Vaad Harabonim – his focus now is on his work with the shul.

He has, for instance, instituted a large range of shiurim, held at different times and for different populations of the shul.

"I am very pleased at the response," he said. "I see a high level of learning, and a real desire for more."

He is also planning several special events, including a two-part series on medical ethics to be held this month and a new bar mitzvah program.

There are also new special programs on Friday nights and Shabbat afternoons on Shabbat mevorchim, the Shabbat before rosh chodesh.

Youth programming is a particular passion for Rabbi Weber, and he is planning a series of dinners for youth to meet and chat with him informally, and he is planning to set up shiurim and minyanim specifically for young people.

"I want to have Shabbatons, and ask kids over to my house – high school kids for talking and learning and young ones on Friday nights for candy, stories and singing."

Programs for young people must have a "spiritual and intellectual sophistication," he said, adding there is serious need for good role models for youth.

A large part of his previous position involved kiruv, bringing people back to observance, something he has done throughout North America as well as in the former Soviet Union, and he hopes to eventually do some of that kind of work in Toronto.

The relationship between a rabbi and his congregation is not only based on what the rabbi has to offer, he said. Rather, "it is two-way relationship," and the rabbi grows according to what the congregation expects and allows him to do.

Rabbi Weber said he considers himself lucky to have joined a shul that pushes him to a higher spiritual level.

"I'm confident about the shul's future," he said.

Israel's economy seen as biggest challenge

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Israel's biggest challenge is its economy, says Aviv Bushinsky, special adviser to foreign minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"We are not all affected by security problems, but we are all affected by economic problems," Bushinsky said at a recent breakfast meeting sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Aviv Bushinsky

There is little foreign investment in the country, the stock market is low, and investors are going elsewhere, Bushinsky said.

"More than 60,000 private businesses went bankrupt in the past year. It is expensive to live there, and we just don't have a plan to tempt foreign investors to come to Israel."

Peace will come "either when Israelis start attributing the low economy to security problems and say enough is enough, or when Palestinians realize [their actions] have not accomplished anything and say 'let's compromise.' "

The problem, he said, is that potential investors don't view Israel as worthwhile.

"They need to believe that the situation will improve and now is a great time to buy, but they don't."

Netanyahu, he said, wants lower taxes in order to spur monetary movement.

"That could help raise the economy, but this government decided to go with a plan that includes raising taxes. This starts people thinking that 'if the government is taking so much money, why should we work?' "

Finding a solution to the conflict is much more complicated "than bringing people to a table and banging their heads together."

It would be impossible for the United States to enforce a solution, he said, because the conflict is too great. "Israelis do things their own way, and they do not like a third party intervening. [This is a conflict] that only time can mend. It will be a long time before both sides become tired and begin looking for a solution."

Israelis have found their own way to deal with the situation, he said. "Security is tight, guards are everywhere and people are always saying 'watch out.' That is how we live; we get used to it. One cafe was blown up so we went to a different cafe. It's a way of life."

Prime Minister Ariel Sharon achieved a great victory in the recent election, said Bushinsky, but to translate it into power is almost impossible.

Sharon is committed to a roadmap provided by the Americans, which includes changing Palestinian leadership, stopping the incitement, and recognizing a Palestinian state, he said.

"If [Sharon] implements this roadmap he will not have a coalition from the right wing, and if he does not implement it he will not have a coalition from the left."

Israel would play an important role in an eventual U.S. attack on Iraq, he said, but its policy is to say nothing.

"If we show support [for the attack] then we will be accused of having personal interest, and we can harm the coalition [President George] Bush is trying to build."

However, "we don't know the exact capability of the Iraqi army. We presume they have fewer missiles than they did in 1991, but they may use nonconventional weapons such as chemical warheads.

"We have experienced all kinds of explosives but never nonconventional ones, and no one knows the outcome of those. [Never mind the] casualties; how will we cope with the panic that would be created?"

Bushinsky believes that after an attack on Iraq, "what was, will be. Nothing will change as long as [Yasser] Arafat is in power."

Russian Jews explore their place in community

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Ask Russian-Jewish émigrés living in Toronto if they feel integrated into the larger Jewish community and you'll hear a variety of views.

But if the question is, do you want to be integrated, the consensus is yes.

The challenge, then, is: how can that desire be made into a reality?

A small group of Jews from the former Soviet Union (FSU) recently held a roundtable discussion on the topic.

"I think it [integration] will come naturally if there is more understanding," said Maia Master, a Moldavian immigrant who is publisher of the weekly newspaper Russian Express.

"There is a problem that Russians aren't spoken about [enough]. There's many bright Russian individuals who contribute to Canadian society. They deserve to be appreciated."

Russian Jews now account for about 25 per cent of the Jews in Toronto. Put another way, if the community was counted by itself, it would be the third largest Jewish community in Canada behind Montreal and Toronto.

Master and her colleagues said the meeting was prompted by a recent CJN article that explored whether Russian Jews have become separated from the rest of the city's Jewish community ("Russian Jews in Toronto: A separate solitude?" CJN, Jan. 9).

Master said she doesn't think there is a separation. She is optimistic that as Russians become more financially established, they will have the means to play a "more spiritual and social" role within the larger Jewish community.

It would be easier for Toronto's Russian Jews to find a niche if the established community reached out to them more, said Vickie Dubrovsky, a former JIAS executive.

"Instead of immigrants fighting their way in, I think the local community should make an effort to bring the Russians in," she said.

Dubrovksy said she wants outreach programs to involve "bonding," rather than fundraising and would like to see more Russians become community leaders.

When Zelina Iskanderova came to Toronto from Uzbekistan with her family 10 years ago, she participated in a JIAS outreach program called Family-to-Family.

The Iskanderovas were paired with a local family with a similar background and had dinners together.

"It was a valuable initiative," said Iskanderova, an adjunct associate professor at the University of Toronto's Institute for Aerospace Studies.

"We got a chance to see how the holidays were celebrated."

Iskanderova's daughter, Svetlana Barkan, was 13 when the family arrived and said the program had the right intention but was overwhelming for recent immigrants.

"I think our family was too green," Barkan said. "It was too early."

Now married to a fellow FSU émigré, Barkan said she'd like synagogues and other community organizations to spearhead programs that would bridge the gap between Russian and Canadian Jews.

"I wouldn't mind meeting a nice Canadian Jewish family and celebrating Shabbos together," Barkan said. "Give us a chance to meet each other."

Joel Mackoff, a Vancouver lawyer and cousin of the Iskanderovas, also advocates these integration programs.

"Efforts have been made to try to integrate through social events and educational facilities," said Mackoff, referring primarily to initiatives in Vancouver.

"There are community dinners in people's homes, programs to meet and greet and all the facilities in the synagogue are available."

Mackoff notes there are distinct cultural differences between Canadians and Russians, but he believes education will increase cultural understanding.

Unfortunately for some Russians, there are barriers to obtaining a Jewish education.

After leaving Belarus, Vladimir Dubrovsky headed with his wife, who is not Jewish, to Israel, where his daughter attended a nursery and quickly learned Hebrew.

"When we came to Canada, we wanted for her to attend a [Jewish] daycare so she could continue to speak Hebrew," recalls Dubrovsky, who has been in Toronto for two years. "But she was rejected [from the school] because my wife is not Jewish."

Dubrovsky recalls that in Belarus, teachers would ask each student their nationality and when he stated he was Jewish, he was embarrassed.

Ironically, in Canada, where Dubrovsky expected to send his daughter to a school where she can be proud to be Jewish, she's been denied admittance.

The roundtable's participants concluded that integration is a two-way street and both émigrés and the established community must do their part in breaking barriers.

CFCJ MISSION: Herb Singer (left) founder and president of Discount Car Rental, is seen with Rabbi Shimon Aisenbach, director of the Canadian Friends of Cuban Jewry (CFCJ), at the Chabad Gate Pharmacy just prior to Singer's recent visit to Cuba. Singer, together with longtime acquaintance Paul Stern, was in Cuba Jan. 24-29 to deliver medical supplies to the country's Jewish community on behalf of CFCJ's ongoing humanitarian work there. The group is planning its 75th mission to Cuba during Purim, when a gala holiday celebration will take place. For details, write to cfcj@sympatico.ca or call 905-707-1053.

Students organize event 'to bring diversity together'

By LARA RABINOVITCH
Special to The CJN

Arab and Jewish artists recently shared the stage at An Evening of Engagement, held on Feb. 6 at the University of Toronto's Koffler Institute Auditorium.

Organized by U of T student James Sevitt and University of Waterloo student Avi Zer-Aviv, the event included musical and theatrical performances and an interfaith dialogue facilitated by educator and community worker Janis Galway. All donations went to Israeli-Palestinian Bereaved Families for Peace, an organization for Jewish and Arab families who have lost children in combat or by terrorism.

Sevitt said he and Zer-Aviv organized the event to "bring diversity together."

They recognized "the need and desire for more sincere communication [between] people who live so closely together in so many ways, [but] actually remain so far apart," Sevitt said.

He added that he and Zer-Aviv wanted to provide a forum for "a plurality of voices" to "interact with each other through sharing and listening, instead of judging and labelling."

The event showcased a wide range of creativity through performances by musicians, actors and dancers of different ethnic and religious backgrounds. Tikkun Community Toronto put on a clever theatrical presentation about the different feelings Israeli and Diaspora Jews have towards Israel. The Jerrahi Sufi Order of Canada performed traditional religious chants. Shakshuka, a musical group combining western instruments such as the flute with Middle Eastern instruments such as the tablah (a small hand-held drum), performed an original piece they had composed that was inspired by an Israeli poem called Makom Shemesh. The Arabesque Dance Company played traditional Arab instruments in a lively performance that included Arabic singing and remarkable belly dancing. The Healing Divas sang motivating and peaceful songs.

Other performers included ethnomusicologist and musician Judith Cohen and her teenage daughter, Tamar, who entertained the audience with their amusing Ladino songs about mothers trying to marry off their independent-minded daughters. At one point, they even incorporated a Yiddish verse into a Sephardi song. This made a good link to the next performers, David Buchbinder, founder of the popular Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band, and his pregnant wife, Roula Said, a belly-dancer, co-founder of the ensemble Doula and leader of another musical group, The Roulettes. Buchbinder and Said combined their Arabic and Ashkenazi backgrounds in an innovative musical performance, with Buchbinder playing the trumpet and Said on the qanun (an Arabic harp-like instrument). Later, the duo led the audience in a Jewish and Arabic melody for the evening's final performance.

During the event's dialogue portion, facilitated by Galway, audience members shared personal experiences, childhood memories, encounters with people of different backgrounds and feelings of vulnerability in an atmosphere of respect.

As Sevitt said at the evening's close, "A lot of this was about reconnecting."

In fact, through the acts of speaking, listening and the sharing of a variety of creative expressions, both the audience and performers seemed to find common ground.

The event was sponsored by Hart House Interfaith Dialogue.

Gift to York U funds Kristallnacht research

A new research project at York University about the impact of Kristallnacht on public opinion in the English-speaking world has been made possible by a $200,000 gift to the York University Foundation by Milton Harris, chairman and CEO of Harris Steel.

"Kristallnacht came just six weeks after the Munich Agreement that supposedly resolved the Czech crisis and brought, in the words of British prime minister, Neville Chamberlain, 'Peace in our time,' " said Harris, a former head of Canadian Jewish Congress.

"The object of this groundbreaking research will be to investigate whether this state-sponsored pogrom had an impact on public opinion in Canada, the United States and Britain, and on the future possibility of real peace with the Nazi regime."

The first phase of the three-year project will focus on research by graduate students in consultation with York's faculty of arts, on the impact of Kristallnacht on public opinion in Canada, the United States and Britain.

Students chosen to work on the project will be specializing in Jewish history, the history of the interwar period, urban history, public opinion, culture, communication and the media.

An international conference at York, leading to the publication of the best papers presented at the symposium, will follow in the second and third phases. A book produced from the conference will include introductory and contextual essays by European history specialists at York.

"[The grant] will provide funding for graduate research assistants and facilitate a major conference and publication on a topic of continuing historical and contemporary significance," said Marlene Shore, the chair of York's history department.'

Baseless arguments have surface appeal

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Amid much confusion about whether the United States is justified, under existing United Nations Security Council resolutions, to initiate a pre-emptive attack on Iraq, a revealing exchange took place – once again – on CBC Newsworld's Counterspin, Feb. 5.

The panel was balanced between two speakers who support the use of force – Ed Morgan, a University of Toronto law professor, and Ruth Wedgwood, a fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations in New York – and two who are opposed, Alistair Millar of the University of Notre Dame in Indiana and David Jacobs, a Toronto-based international human rights lawyer and member of the group Lawyers Against The War. Host Carol Off moderated impartially.

Against protests from Morgan that he was misconstruing international law, Jacobs insisted that even if Iraq has weapons of mass destruction and is in "material breach" of UN Security Council resolutions demanding that it reveal and destroy them, these conditions are insufficient to warrant the use of force. "You have to add on that there is a threat to international peace and security," Jacobs said.

What Jacobs and many others fail to understand is that all 17 Security Council resolutions against Iraq have been passed under the rarely used Chapter VII, which is invoked specifically when a country is judged by the Security Council to be a threat to international peace and security. In Iraq's case, it was used as a result of its 1990 invasion of Kuwait and because of its acquisition of weapons of mass destruction.

It is precisely because the international community long ago determined that Iraq is an aggressor and a menace to world peace that it is being forced to give up these weapons. Thus, when Jacobs compares the United States and Iraq, and states that "The U.S. has, I think, weapons of mass destruction. The U.S. has, in fact, used weapons of mass destruction. The U.S. has, in fact, breached international law," he deals more in political polemics than in objective legal reality.

The UN has not judged the United States, just as it has not judged Britain or Israel for that matter, to be threats to international peace and security. There have been no Chapter VII resolutions passed against them. Jacobs' argument is baseless and absurd, but it has surface appeal for those who cannot make the proper distinctions between responsible countries that possess nuclear weapons and irresponsible, dangerous regimes that have been ordered to surrender their weaponry.

An engaging but voluble Jacobs even went on to pronounce that "there is incontrovertible evidence that Iraq has no weapons of mass destruction at all." This has been proved utterly false by UN weapons inspection teams themselves.

Radicalism has its amusements along with its absurdities, and Jacobs' pronouncements offered both. However, the issues before us are deadly serious and must be confronted factually and coherently.

Richard Holbrook, former U.S. ambassador to the UN, reminded everyone of the facts on PBS' The NewsHour with Jim Lehrer (Feb. 10). Holbrook emphasized that UN Resolution 1441 and earlier resolutions on Iraq going back to 1991 indeed provide sufficient grounds to warrant the use of force to compel Iraq to give up its weapons of mass destruction.

Fundraiser pays tribute to Herb Gray

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Friends, family, former and present colleagues, politicians and clergy came together recently to celebrate the life and career of longtime MP and former deputy prime minister Herb Gray.

The fundraising event, co-chaired by Elliot Melamed and Eric Weisbloom for Congregation Beth Shalom West, was held at Ottawa's Centrepointe Theatre.

Under the direction of Cantor Daniel Benlolo, the program included the Gray Band, the band A Touch of Klez, the Herb and Spices Youth Choir and acclaimed concert pianist Shoshana Telner.

Singing with the Gray Band, Benlolo performed a number of Gray's favourite tunes, including some Beatles classics.

The band also played several selections dedicated to "water themes," in recognition of Gray's new position as chair of the Canadian Section of the International Joint Commission, which prevents and resolves disputes between the United States and Canada under the 1909 Boundary Waters Treaty.

Ottawa Mayor Bob Chiarelli and MP Marlene Caterall paid tribute to Gray's nearly 40-year political career, as did Rabbi Howard Finkelstein, spiritual leader of Congregation Beth Shalom West.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Machzikei Hadas joked that although Gray belongs to his congregation, he was willing to lend him to "the competition" – for the evening only.

Throughout the evening, slides of Gray were projected on a large screen, depicting highlights of his career and family life. Among family members there to support him was his infant granddaughter who, in the arms of her parents, sat in the front row.

After Gray was presented with a framed portrait of himself, Benlolo began singing Gray's request, My Way. Midway through, Gray took to the stage to sing a version of the Frank Sinatra classic Gray had re-written to reflect his own life.

Protest organizer should be expelled: Hillel leader

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Pro-Palestinian activist Samer Elatrash should have been expelled from Concordia University for his role in the violent demonstration that blocked the visit of Benjamin Netanyahu to Concordia last Sept. 9, says the president of Hillel in Montreal.

But Yoni Petel said the three-year suspension Elatrash received from a university disciplinary panel does "send a serious message that Concordia won't tolerate that kind of behaviour."

Elatrash, a vice-president of Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights and probably the highest profile pro-Palestinian activist at Concordia, revealed his sentence to the media earlier this month.

After closed-door hearings, he was convicted by a three-member student panel of all five charges against him under Concordia's Code of Rights and Responsibilities, including rioting, assault and harassment.

Elatrash, 23, an English literature student, said he will appeal.

He is one of seven people, not all of them Concordia students, facing criminal charges in connection with the Netanyahu demonstration. He has been charged with illegal assembly, obstruction, disturbing the peace, assaulting a police officer and conspiracy. He has also been charged with breach of his bail conditions and resisting arrest.

The only other accused who had made his sentence known at time of writing was Concordia Student Union (CSU) vice-president Yves Engler, who was suspended for one semester for "vexatious behaviour," the student newspaper The Link reported. Engler also plans to appeal.

In all, 10 students faced charges under the university code for their involvement in the Sept. 9 protest. Their names, charges and decisions were not disclosed by the university.

Petel said he was not familiar with exactly what charges were laid against Elatrash, but he said he regards him as "one of, if not the person, who planned the riot. He made it known weeks in advance that he planned to shut down Netanyahu by any means necessary."

Asked if he thought Elatrash's punishment was appropriate, Petel, a McGill student, replied, "I don't know what punishment would suit denying people their rights under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. But I think he should have been expelled."

Possible sanctions against the seven students ranged from written reprimand to expulsion, meaning permanent removal from the university.

"Certainly, I'll be happy if I don't see Samer around campus. He was clearly an agitator who created an unpleasant atmosphere," Petel said.

During the hearings, held in January, two of the student adjudicators called a press conference to say they felt pressured by the university administration into issuing harsher punishments than they felt were warranted.

Stephan Herman and Anas Sibaii accused university officials of intimidation and withholding evidence, and they complained of not having enough training to do the job.

A university spokesperson defended the disciplinary process as fair and denied the allegations.

Al-Aqsa terrorists not yet on government banned list

OTTAWA — Stockwell Day, the Canadian Alliance's foreign affairs critic, last week slammed the federal government for failing to include important terrorist groups, including the al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, in its expanded list of banned organizations.

"Today's announcement is noteworthy not so much for the terrorists that are on the list, as for those that are not," Day stated.

The former Alliance leader was referring to the addition by Ottawa of the Abu Nidal Organization, the Abu Sayyaf Group and Sendero Luminoso to Canada's list of "terrorist entities."

With the addition of the three organizations, the list of banned groups rose to 19. The groups are outlawed under Canada's Anti-Terrorism Act, which was passed in the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks on New York and Washington. The law makes it illegal for Canadians to have any financial associations with the groups.

Day said the ban omits important terrorist groups.

Special needs funds not reaching kids

"They then refer us to the Ministry of Education," she said.

In a public school, these needs would be met jointly by the ministries of education and health, Goldman said. However, independent schools don't fit into the same model because they don't receive resources through the Ministry of Education.

Molinari said "the intent of the provision was not to exclude," but unfortunately, it has worked out that way. The budget is new, and "people don't understand it," she added.

Clement said the "challenge now is getting all players to the same table so that a game plan can be implemented."

Simon Rosenblum of Canadian Jewish Congress said that at this point, cabinet approval would be needed to change the eligibility requirements.

Rosenblum noted he has assurances from Deputy Minister of Finance Bob Christie that the money is a permanent part of the budget and will be renewed annually.

In addition, Rosenblum said there seems to be movement from the ministries of education and health to try to resolve the problems stemming from the eligibility requirements.

John Vanasselt, a spokesperson for the Alliance of Christian Schools, said that "the limitations and restrictions put on by the eligibility requirements have prevented the government's intentions from being fulfilled."

Jewish, Muslim groups unite on ritual slaughter

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) has teamed up with a national Islamic group to urge lawmakers to make it virtually impossible to bring charges against anyone involved in the ritual slaughter of animals.

In a presentation to the Senate legal and constitutional affairs committee, Congress suggested Bill C-10B: An Act to Amend the Criminal Code (Cruelty to Animals), be amended to specifically exempt shchitah (ritual slaughter) and killing under halal, the Muslim equivalent. Congress also recommended that any prosecution under the bill require the consent of a provincial attorney general.

Exemptions sought for shchitah, halal

Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations, said Congress received a respectful hearing and is heartened the House of Commons legal committee earlier added provisions to the bill that would make conviction for engaging in shchitah less likely.

But the recommendations advanced by Congress and endorsed by the Islamic Council of Imams-Canada would make the traditional ritual practices virtually bulletproof. "That would significantly reduce the opportunity for a frivolous prosecution," he said.

"What concerns us is the possibility of private prosecutions. That leaves the field open to anti-Semites and ill-intentioned ideologues to launch a prosecution, and though it most likely wouldn't succeed, it gives the opportunity for them to exploit it for publicity purposes, and it would put the Jewish and Muslim communities on the defensive," Prutschi said.

Without the proposed amendments, the Jewish or Muslim communities might be put to the expense of hiring lawyers and defending shchitah or halal in a court case meant to embarrass them, he said.

Prutschi noted that shchitah has been banned to various degrees in several European countries – Norway, Sweden, Austria (there is an exemption for Jews, though not for Muslims) and Switzerland (which only allows the kosher slaughter of poultry). Holland recently withdrew a proposal to ban the practice.

"There are certain extremist groups in the animal rights movement who want to push the envelope in a number of areas," Prutschi said. "On the other hand, there are anti-Semites who would be interested in using this to embarrass the community."

Anti-Semites have advanced "the libel of the kosher tax" to claim consumers are paying an extra tax on products that carry kosher certification, he said.

Dr. Avi Beker, secretary general of the World Jewish Congress, told the Cleveland Jewish News recently that attempts to ban Jewish ritual practices mark a disturbing anti-Semitic trend. In addition to shchitah, some groups have attempted to make ritual circumcision illegal in Sweden, he noted.

A Montreal-based group has also argued against ritual circumcision, claiming it is a form of child abuse.

Winnipeger raising money, awareness for Israeli POW group

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — In the fall of 1973, Arie Lavy was a young Israeli soldier stationed on the Israeli side of the Suez Canal.

On Oct. 6, he along with the rest of Israel awoke to find the Egyptian army attacking and overwhelming Israeli positions all along the waterway. Lavy, who was taken prisoner, said he was fortunate he wasn't killed, as were other Israeli soldiers taken prisoner by the Egyptians at the time.

He and his fellow POWs were frequently beaten during their 45 days of imprisonment in Egypt, he said. They were released in a prisoner exchange.

Thirty years later, Lavy is comfortably settled in Winnipeg with his wife and teenage daughter and works as a consultant in the computer industry.

But many other former Israeli POWs are not as well off.

"I'm lucky," Lavy said. "I have been able to get on with my life. Many others, however, are still haunted by their experiences.

"They have nightmares and suffer from claustrophobia. They have trouble keeping a job. Their divorce rates are high and some have a history of physical violence. Some need a lot of help."

To try to provide that help, Lavy is seeking to raise funds in North America for a newly formed organization in Israel that helps former POWs.

Lavy learned about Irim B'laila (Awake at Night) during a visit to Israel in early January. It was started by former POWs to help their fellow POWs cope with the emotional and psychological problems many experience as a result of their imprisonment.

Lavy was in Israel because both his wife, Michal, a teacher at Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, and their daughter, Tammy, were in Israel at the time on different programs. While he was there, his friend and fellow former POW, Shimon Tal (who is now Israel's water commissioner) told him about a special evening for former POWs.

"A year ago, Chabad started writing five new Torah scrolls," Lavy said.

"The fifth scroll was dedicated to Israel's 300 or so former POWs. The scroll was being completed at a special evening at [Israeli President] Moshe Katsav's house. There were over 700 people there for the occasion."

Lavy said the evening "was very emotional. A lot of tears flowed."

The Israeli government is slowly becoming aware of the problems faced by former POWs, and there is some talk of compensation, but the government doesn't have much money, Lavy said.

"We would also like to see some retroactive financial support for the widows and children of those of us who have passed away," he said. "In the meantime, we are also trying to help ourselves."

Stretch your grocery budget with Granny Fanny

Food, Scrumptious Food

By BEVERLY LEVITT
Special to The CJN

While pessimistic bears are cautiously whispering that the stock market seems poised for a comeback, and over-ebullient bulls are bottom-feeding low-priced hot tips with abandon, Granny Fanny shoos both animals away.

"You got to save for a rainy day! Waste not, want not," she warns.

Granny shops primarily at garage sales, has grandpa drive her all over town to find the cheapest gas and scans newspapers for sales instead of current events. She's always bragging she still has the first dime grandpa ever made.

She regales us with stories about the Great Depression – how she collected Coke bottles on the beach to buy my mom shoes; how multiple families lived in the same apartment so they could save on rent; and even how she recycled greeting cards by saving them and reusing them the following year.

But mostly she talks about stretching the last penny out of her food allowance.

So when Granny became outraged after I threw away some mushy, black bananas that had been sitting in my fruit bowl two weeks too long, saying they would make perfectly good banana bread, I perked up and listened.

Because more than half a century after the Great Depression, she still practises what she learned in those days – how to resurrect food that has any life left in it at all.

And it occurred to me that I should pass along some of my Granny's tips, such as what to do with those six gorgeous apples that looked picture perfect in the market, but when you took your first bite were tasteless; or what to do with the lone vegetables left behind in the crisper that you can't bear to throw into the compost pile just yet; and, finally, what to do when your milk has reached that uncertain date, your eggs have seen fresher days and your bread is so stale it doesn't even crumble.

Granny says, "Don't toss 'em, grind 'em or bury 'em! Cook 'em!"

GRANNY FANNY'S DEAD VEGETABLE SOUP

Pick and choose among your favourite vegetables and spices – just follow the directions of when to add them so they don't become overcooked.

1½ cups oldish onions, chopped
4 cloves garlic, crushed
½ cup celery nearing retirement, chopped
½ cup old sweet peppers, chopped
1 tbsp. olive oil
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. sweet paprika
½ tsp. dried basil
½ tsp. dry thyme
¼ tsp. ground cloves
dash of cayenne
1 bay leaf
½ cup potatoes, in chunks
½ cup carrots, sliced
½ cup cranky parsley, chopped
2 cups elderly vegetables (broccoli, cauliflower, summer or winter squash, leeks, potatoes, sweet potatoes, eggplant, peas, green beans, corn, carrots) chopped
6 cups stock or water
1 tsp. tamari
1 tbsp. dry red wine
½ freshly squeezed lemon juice
1 cup fresh tomatoes, chopped freshly ground pepper freshly grated parmesan cheese (optional) freshly baked croutons made from stale bread (optional)

Vegetable soup from The BestSoup cookbook, Robert Rose publisher.

In a soup kettle, sauté onions, garlic, celery, and sweet peppers in olive oil about 5 minutes, until they are soft and translucent. Add salt, paprika, basil, thyme, cloves, cayenne, and bay leaf to the mixture. Add potatoes, carrots and parsley, continue sautéeing about 8 minutes. Add remaining vegetables except tomatoes and sauté another 5 minutes.

Add boiling stock or water, tamari, wine, lemon juice, and simmer another 10 minutes or until all the vegetables are tender. Top with chopped tomatoes, a few grinds of pepper, parmesan cheese, croutons, and serve immediately. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

A CHICKEN IN EVERY POT WITH LEFTOVER WHITE WINE AND WRINKLED OLIVES

1 2½ to 3 lb. chicken, quartered
3 tbsp. garlic, peeled and finely puréed
2 tsp. dried oregano
¼ cup fresh but wilted cilantro, finely chopped coarse salt and freshly ground black pepper to taste
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. extra virgin olive oil
½ cup pitted prunes
½ cup pitted past their prime green olives
¼ cup capers with a bit of juice
3 bay leaves
⅓ cup brown sugar
1 cup leftover white wine (age is not important)

In a large bowl, combine garlic, oregano, cilantro, salt and pepper, vinegar, olive oil, prunes, olives, capers and juice, bay leaves, sugar and wine. Pour over chicken and let marinade, refrigerated, overnight.

Preheat oven to 350. Arrange chicken in single layer in a baking pan. Spoon marinade evenly over chicken.

Save those bananas

Bake chicken for 50 minutes to 1 hour or until tender, basting frequently with juices. With a slotted spoon, transfer chicken, prunes, olives and capers to serving platter. Moisten with a few spoonfuls of pan juices and sprinkle generously with cilantro. Pass remaining juices in sauceboat. Serves 4.

SAVE A BLACK BANANA BREAD

¼ cup butter, softened
¼ cup peanut oil
⅔ cup sugar
2 eggs, slightly beaten
3-4 aging bananas
2 tbsp. sour milk
1 tsp. lemon juice
1 tbsp. lemon zest
⅔ cups walnuts or pecans, chopped
¼ cup raisins (optional)
1¼ cups flour, sifted
1½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. cinnamon
½ tsp. grated nutmeg (optional)

Preheat oven to 350. Butter a 9 x 5 x 3" inch loaf pan. Cream butter, oil and sugar. Add eggs one at a time, beating well after each addition.

In small bowl, mash bananas with a fork. Mix in milk, lemon juice, lemon zest, nuts and raisins. In another bowl, sift together flour, baking powder, baking soda, salt, cinnamon and nutmeg.

Add banana mixture to dry mixture, stirring carefully to make sure everything is blended, if desired. Pour batter into loaf pan. Bake for about one 1¼ hours, until a toothpick inserted in centre comes out clean. Cool 10 minutes. Remove from pan, invert and cool completely on wire rack. Makes 1 loaf.

IDF counterattack kills head of Hamas military wing

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The head of the Hamas military wing in Gaza, Riyad Abu-Zed, was shot Monday morning by Israeli troops and died a short while later in a Be'er Sheva hospital.

Abu-Zed was considered the replacement for Hamas leader Salah Shehadeh, killed by the Israel Defence Forces last July. Palestinian sources said IDF troops ambushed Abu-Zed's car near the al Bureij refugee camp in Gaza and fired at it.

The IDF said the troops intended to arrest Abu-Zed, not assassinate him.

On Sunday, Israeli Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz said the army would deal a heavy blow to Hamas after its military wing claimed responsibility for a landmine that killed the four-member crew of an Israeli Magach 7-Kfir tank in northern Gaza on Saturday.

> The IDF said the troops intended to arrest Abu-Zed, not assassinate him.

It was the fourth fatal instance of a tank driving over an explosive device in Gaza in the last year. An army investigation found the tank, which is less heavily armoured than the Merkava tank, likely deviated from its path behind an army tractor that was to detonate any explosive devices, Israel Radio reported.

Hours after the attack, six Hamas militants were killed in an explosion near Gaza City while inspecting a small remote-control glider the group said it obtained for use in new "operations."

Hamas officials said they believed Israel had booby-trapped the device and vowed to avenge the deaths, although in the past, there have been incidents in which Palestinians preparing bombs caused them to blow up prematurely.

"We will retaliate for their new crime, for their new terror action... It will be a very expensive price," Hamas official Abdel-Aziz al-Rantissi told reporters.

Also Monday, Palestinian security forces told the IDF they found five missile launchers near the Gaza settlement of Netzarim, Israel Radio reported. The launchers were unarmed, but were connected with electric cables. The IDF authorized the Palestinians to send special forces to dismantle the launcher, the report said.

Meanwhile, in the West Bank, troops arrested 26 wanted Palestinians, while in Gaza City early Monday, witnesses said about 35 IDF tanks and attack helicopters entered the city and blew up a five-story building where Hamas's Ahmed Ghandour and his family lived. It stood next to a neighbourhood where other Hamas leaders live, witnesses said.

Ghandour is the top aide to Hamas bomb-maker Adnan al-Rouland, the man believed responsible for planning the tank attack on Saturday and the killing of three Israeli soldiers near the Israeli community of Dugit in Gaza last June.

Israel Radio said troops came under fire while demolishing the building and returned fire. Palestinian hospital officials said two people were killed and four civilians, including a doctor, were wounded by the shooting.

IDF sources, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Monday an operation was underway in Gaza City, but it was not a large-scale invasion.

Witnesses said that after surrounding the building, soldiers ordered everyone out and took the men away. Then soldiers sent dogs inside to see if anyone was left behind.

Before blowing up the building, they told residents of nearby houses to evacuate and leave their windows open to help absorb the shock of the explosion.

Israel has been blowing up houses of suspected militants for several months as a deterrent. Palestinians and human rights groups charge innocent relatives are made to suffer, but Israelis officials believe the tactic might cause Palestinians to stop carrying out attacks.

Police chief predicts increase in terror activity for 2003

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The number of people killed in terrorist acts in 2002 rose by more than 100 per cent compared to the previous year, Police Commissioner Shlomo Aharonishky said Sunday, adding that the number of people injured in terror attacks also increased sharply last year.

He predicted a further increase in terror activity this year, as well as more violence and severe crimes due to security-related tension and the country's economic plight.

Aharonishky said police are working in full co-operation with Israel's security forces and the Home Front Command in anticipation of a U.S. attack on Iraq and the possibility of missiles landing in Israel. The police also are prepared for any attempt at a mass terrorist attack.

Last year 456 people were killed and 2,300 were injured in 1,781 terror attacks, he said. In 2001, 208 people were killed and 1,525 were injured in terror attacks.

A total of 261 people were killed in 227 terrorist attacks inside the Green Line in 2002.

Police managed to foil 45 attacks and prevent the explosion of 236 bombs in more than 550 counter-terrorist activities in 2002. Twenty-one police officers were killed and 70 injured in terror attacks and preventive action.

Aharonishky said the number of reported crimes were roughly the same in 2002, though there was a 2.5 per cent decrease in violent offences.

In total, 167 people were murdered, including 12 women killed by their husbands and two men killed by their wives.

CJN Purim Art Contest

It's time again for our annual Purim Art Contest .

Who can enter: Children in grades 1 to 6 inclusive are eligible. The children of CJN employees are not eligible.

Prizes: The judges will choose one drawing from two different students in each grade. These "winning" drawings will be published in The CJN 2003 Purim Poster. In addition, each of the 12 children whose drawings have been selected will receive a cheque for $25.

How to enter: You may submit as many drawings as you want. However they should not be too small nor too large. Please paint or draw bright, bold, colorful pictures. You may use markers, crayons, paint or pencils. Please send us your name, address, phone number, age and grade along with your drawings.

You may mail or deliver your drawings to: CJN Community Contests, The Canadian Jewish News, 1500 Don Mills Road, Suite 205, North York, Ontario M3B 3K4. If you want us to return the pictures to you, please provide a stamped, self-addressed envelope. Otherwise, we will be unable to do so.

The contest closes at 3 p.m. on Friday, February 21, 2003. We will undoubtedly receive many wonderful submissions from children all across the country. But only 12 of the drawings will be chosen as the "winners." The judges will base their decisions on a number of factors such as: the use of color, the imaginative quality of the drawing and the way it tells an aspect of the story of Purim. The judges' decisions will be final. The chances of winning depend upon the number and quality of submissions received.

How the Winner will be announced: The children whose pictures are chosen will be notified by telephone before the start of Shabbat on Friday, February 28, 2003.

When the prizes will be awarded: The "winning" pictures will be published in The CJN of March 13, 2003. Have fun and good luck.

Any litigation respecting the conduct and awarding of a prize in this contest may be submitted to the Régie des Loteries et courses du Québec.

Belgian court allows for Sharon's prosecution once he leaves office

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's Attorney General Elyakim Rubinstein last week attacked a Belgian Supreme Court ruling that would allow Belgium to prosecute Israelis for their involvement in the Sabra and Shatila massacres in Beirut during the 1982 Lebanon war, calling it "a delusional legal proceeding."

The ruling said Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon can face trial for his alleged involvement in the affair, but only after he leaves office and no longer has diplomatic immunity. The ruling also allows for Defence Ministry director-general Amos Yaron to be prosecuted for his alleged involvement in the massacres, which occurred when he was commander of Israeli forces in Beirut.

In response to the ruling, Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu last week recalled Israel's ambassador to Belgium, Yehudi Kinar.

"It was not the court that took the [current] measures, but it helped these decisions. It could have understood very quickly what it was all about – that the motive for these procedures was political," Rubinstein said last week, adding that the state attorney's office will defend any Israeli put on trial by Belgium.

Netanyahu also summoned Belgium's ambassador to Israel, Wilfried Geens to strongly protest the ruling.

"Israel will not accept another blood libel against the Jewish nation and Israel is not Europe, the verdict was more political than judicial," Netanyahu said. "Belgium is giving a prize to terror."

Some 800 Palestinians were killed by Phalangist troops, Israeli allies at the time, in the two refugee camps while Sharon was Israel's defence minister. An Israeli inquiry found him indirectly responsible and forced him to resign as defense minister in 1983.

Last June, a lower court in Belgium dismissed the war crimes case brought against Sharon last year, saying he could not be tried because he doesn't live in Belgium and has diplomatic immunity.

In a statement, Chief Ashkenazi Rabbi Yisrael Lau called the latest ruling "outrageous" and "hypocritical."

"The thought that a nation which stood by and watched when Jewish blood was spilled and ignored the victims' cries, is now elevating itself in the position of world policeman is outrageous in the extreme," he said.

The head of the state prosecutor's international division, Irit Kahan, who represented Israel at the Belgian Supreme Court hearing, said last week the latest ruling was a political decision and that deliberations throughout the hearing deviated from accepted judicial norms and veered towards the political.

Yaron said the decision "was political in nature, and dangerous… Belgium is taking upon itself the mission of world judge. This is an attempt to rouse disorder in the world."

Israeli President Moshe Katsav also criticized the decision. In a strongly worded message to Belgium's King Albert II, he wrote that Israeli troops had operated according to international norms and the laws of conscience and human morals.

Sources in the Foreign Ministry said last week that the newly appointed Kinar, who was to have presented his credentials to King Albert II earlier this week, won't return to Belgium any time soon, because the downgrading of relations with Belgium will continue for some time and there is no immediate way out of the diplomatic impasse.

During consultations last week, some ministry officials urged Netanyahu to cut diplomatic ties with Belgium, but he said only that he would discuss the issue with all responsible bodies this week.

Ministry sources were also quoted that the decision to recall Kinar was an over-reaction.

Among those questioning the move is the ministry's former director-general, Alon Liel. "Recalling an ambassador is a very serious step… We have to remember that we are talking about a decision from a court, not the Belgian government," he said.

Government sources were concerned about the possibility of future prosecutions against Israelis in Belgium because of the court ruling. But they also noted Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is also in line for prosecution in Belgium over complaints filed against him by Israeli terror victims.

Meanwhile, Yaron, who is most directly threatened by the ruling, said he would be consulting legal advisors about it. "I am not worried by the decision. I don't travel to Belgium. The ministry doesn't have any business with Belgium, and I haven't been there since becoming director-general," he said.

One worry is that Belgium could use extradition treaties Israel has signed to issue a pan-European warrant for Yaron's arrest. But others note the ruling only stipulates that an investigation into Yaron's involvement can begin.

Meanwhile, the Belgian government has been fashioning new legislation that would severely limit the ability to prosecute suspected war criminals with no connection to Belgium.

• According to defence minister Shaul Mofaz, Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat instructed leaders of Palestinian terror groups in February 2001 to cause thousands of Israeli deaths "so that Israel would give in to Palestinian demands." Mofaz also said Israel has additional intelligence proving Arafat's direct involvement in terror and said the United States and others also have this information.

• The Likud Party officially launched coalition negotiations with other parties to cobble together a majority government for the 16th Knesset.

Feb. 11

• A private funeral service was held for Columbia astronaut Ilan Ramon at a hilltop cemetery in Nahalal, a moshav in northern Israel near an air base where Ramon had served.

Feb. 12

• Israeli anti-aircraft units received notice telling them to be prepared for the possibility of an immediate call-up for reserve duty. The soldiers alerted were those who would man Patriot missile batteries that arrived recently from Germany, as well as reservists who would man Hawk missile batteries.

Feb. 13

• Twenty-four soldiers were injured, three seriously, at a training accident at a military base in the Golan Heights.

Feb. 14

• Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat announced he had decided to appoint a prime minister at the urging of international peace brokers. Western diplomats urged him to provide them with a timetable by Sunday for naming a prime minister and said the appointment should be made before the start of a U.S. war with Iraq.

Jerusalem's first haredi mayor to replace Olmert

Lupoliansky said he intends to make an effort to reduce the poverty in the capital and to equalize education opportunities. However, he said he has yet to formulate detailed plans for running the city.

"There is nothing easier than outlining a series of populistic plans that will win applause," he said. "All my acquaintances know that is not my work-style."

Roni Aloni, a member of the secular Jerusalem Now list, said, "Lupoliansky is the worst thing that could happen to Jerusalem." She expressed fear that a haredi mayor would ban soccer games on Shabbat, stop budgets to museums that operate on the weekends and not issue licences to the few restaurants and cafes open in Jerusalem on Friday night and Saturday.

However, Deputy Mayor Haim Miller, also of Agudat Yisrael, said Lupoliansky's appointment would in fact help reassure the capital's concerned secular residents.

"It will decrease the tension between secular and religious residents, because people will see that nothing terrible is happening, and the city will continue to manage itself," Miller said.

Olmert gave an emotional speech as he parted from the city council after nearly 10 years as Jerusalem mayor. "Anyone choosing to fill this position, at this time and in this place, could not have done so but from a deep sense of commitment and dedication," he said. "That is how I felt from the first day I set foot in City Hall and to this day. It is hard for me to think that from now on, I'll change my daily routine that I got used to for so many years, which from beginning to end was focused on one thing only – the safety of the city and its residents, and the ability to live our lives here in Jerusalem in peace, quiet and mutual tolerance."

Olmert suggested that his next cabinet office will have a bearing on Jerusalem, telling Lupoliansky: "Your days will not be easy, nor will your nights. It will not be simple to deal with the natural suspicions directed at anyone in public office."

Lupoliansky, 50, is father of 12 children. He was first elected to the city council in 1989 and was subsequently appointed deputy to then-mayor Teddy Kollek and placed in charge of community services and family services.

In 1976, Lupoliansky and his father founded the organization Yad Sarah, which has become Israel's main arm for distributing free medical equipment to sick people. The organization is manned by 6,000 volunteers in 97 branches nationwide.

After Olmert was elected mayor in 1993, Lupoliansky was appointed deputy mayor, and since the end of 1998, he has stood in for Olmert when Olmert was abroad.

Police investigate fire on French synagogue

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

PARIS — A fire broke out at a synagogue outside Paris early Sunday, causing heavy damage to the building and forcing the evacuation of a dozen people, firefighters said.

Nine people living in apartments above the synagogue in Saint-Mande, east of Paris, were treated for smoke inhalation, firefighters said. The cause of the blaze was not immediately known but an investigation was underway.

Some 80 firefighters were deployed to battle the flames, which ravaged the hallway and main stairwell. Local rabbis and community leaders visited the site.

The synagogue was located on the ground floor of a four-story residential building. When firefighters arrived at the scene, panicky residents were screaming for help from their windows.

Authorities increased security at Jewish religious sites last year following a wave of attacks on synagogues, Jewish schools and cemeteries. In the most serious case, a synagogue in southern Marseille was burned to the ground in March.

Zundel may be deported to Canada

"The United States doesn't have to send Zundel back to Canada. The United States still has discretion, and Canada should ask the United States to exercise that discretion," said David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

Though Zundel lived in Canada for 42 years, he never obtained Canadian citizenship, having twice been rejected as a security threat. While in Canada, he gained international notoriety as one of the world's foremost disseminators of Holocaust-denial and pro-Nazi propaganda. He moved to the United States in 2000 after selling his "bunker" on Toronto's Carlton Street and proclaiming he was fed up with the Canadian legal system.

At The CJN's press time, he was cooling his heels in a Tennessee jail after being arrested by five Immigration and Naturalization (INS) agents at his home in Sevierville for overstaying a temporary U.S. visa.

A few days later, a U.S. district court turned down an application by Zundel for an injunction against a deportation order.

According to court documents filed by Zundel's lawyer, Zundel had applied for "immigrant status adjustment… as a result of being married to a U.S. citizen." A hearing was set for June 12, 2001, but Zundel's attorney, an immigration specialist from Memphis, did not appear, the Knoxville News-Sentinel reported.

INS spokesperson Temple Black initially indicated Zundel would be deported to Germany, but he subsequently backtracked, saying under the terms of a bilateral agreement, Canada would receive Zundel as the last country he lived in prior to moving to the United States.

He suggested Zundel could be returned to Canada this week.

But Farber said Coderre had told a Congress delegation shortly before Zundel's arrest that Canada would not become a haven for hatemongers. "This situation has now developed and we'll be in touch with his office," Farber said.

Matas said while Zundel's legal status in Canada would be unclear if he returned, Canada could avoid the issue by calling on American immigration authorities to send him directly to Germany. Matas, an immigration lawyer, said he believes Zundel does not fit within the terms of the reciprocal agreement.

"Canadians can say to the Americans, 'We have to take him if you give him back to us. But you don't have to give him back to us. It would be better for everybody if you send him to Germany.'"

CIC spokesperson Rene Mercier declined to comment. "I can't discuss an individual case," he said. "Under the Privacy Act, I'm prevented from doing so."

According to the Web site Zundel operates in conjunction with his wife, Ingrid Rimland, Zundel missed an immigration hearing in 2001 and was arrested without warning.

The prospect of Zundel being returned to Germany seemed to alarm Rimland. Writing on the Web, Rimland told supporters: "Because of my husband's high political profile and the enormous power of the Holocaust lobby in America, I fear that his enemies plan to whisk him out of the country to Germany as fast as they can."

A naturalized American of German ancestry, Rimland said her husband faces up to five years in a German jail for denying the Holocaust.

In Canada, Zundel has been before the courts on many occasions. In 1985, he was convicted of publishing "false news" – for a pamphlet that denied the Holocaust – but following a second trial and several appeals, the Supreme Court of Canada overturned his conviction on Charter of Rights and Freedoms grounds.

Zundel continued to publish anti-Semitic materials, this time turning to the Internet. That prompted Holocaust survivor Sabina Citron and the Toronto Mayor's Committee on Community and Race Relations to bring a complaint about his Web site to the Canadian Human Rights Commission, which convened a tribunal to look into the case. Zundel departed before the tribunal issued its findings, but the tribunal subsequently issued an order that called on Zundel to remove material from his Web site that is likely to expose Jews to hatred or contempt.

The tribunal found the Web site "viciously targeted [Jews] on the basis of their religious and cultural associations." Should he return to Canada, Zundel's failure to comply with the tribunal's order could result in a finding of contempt of court and a possible jail term.

Farber said Zundel's latest legal imbroglio suits him well. "He is the man that nobody wants, that's clear.

"As far as I'm concerned, [prison] stripes look good on him. He wears them well."

Saudi textbooks filled with hatred of West, Jews

By MICHELLE DARDASHTI
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK —A new survey speaks volumes about Saudi Arabian attitudes toward Jews, Christians and the West.

An analysis of 93 state-sponsored textbooks in Saudi Arabia, conducted by the Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace in partnership with the American Jewish Committee, founds Saudi students are being taught that "Jews are wickedness in its very essence," "Zionism is a nationalist, racist and aggressive movement" and the West "is the source of the past and present misfortunes in the Muslim world."

David Harris, executive director of the AJC called the report "a smoking gun." He said that "despite Saudi government statements to the West promoting unity, friendship and tolerance, the report clearly demonstrates a disturbing pattern of hateful language."

For Arnon Groiss, the director of the Voice of Israel's Arabic news division who was responsible for compiling and translating the data in the study, the most compelling finding was "the extent of the paranoia the Saudis are trying to instill in their children regarding the West, beyond the expected anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism."

This is the fourth report Groiss has issued for the centre – following two on Palestinian and one on Israeli textbooks, – and in many ways, it could be the most significant.

It comes as increasing attention is being paid to anti-Semitism in Saudi Arabia, a long-time U.S. ally. The Saudis also have come in for criticism since it was found that 15 of the 19 hijackers in the Sept. 11 terror attacks were Saudi citizens and that Saudi money helps fund Palestinian terror groups.

Andre Marcus, founding chairman of the centre, which has offices in both New York and Jerusalem, said the educational system is key, since decisions taken at an autocratic political level don't necessarily make it down to the street.

Elsewhere in the Arab world, that disconnect – for example, between the Palestinian Authority's peace deals with Israel and the anti-Israel messages in Palestinian textbooks and official media – makes it much more difficult for peace to succeed, Marcus said.

"Textbooks are a powerful tool," Marcus said, "I would say even more than the media, more than TV."

Attitudes towards Jews and Israel – which doesn't even exist on Saudi maps – are particularly noteworthy in light of the plan for Mideast peace proposed last year by Saudi Crown Prince Abdullah.

Marcus notes another reason why a study on the Saudis is so critical: As the cradle of Islam, Saudi Arabia's educational system exerts influence on curricula in other Muslim countries.

The textbooks make clear the Saudis believe Islam is the only true religion and that followers of other religions can't be trusted or befriended.

Marcus said the texts are "very much against peace and an education of peace."

Given the tight controls on information in Saudi Arabia, information for the study was gathered with great difficulty, from Saudis who want to see the educational system revamped.

These are people "who are tired of seeing education used as propaganda, and would like to see some changes in their own country," Marcus said.

Centre helps victims deal with long-term trauma

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Treating psychotrauma victims has not been a priority in Israel because, for the most part, Israelis are focussed on survival, says Dr. Danny Brom, director of the Albert & Temmy Latner Centre for the Treatment of Psychotrauma of Herzog Hospital.

"When people are in survival mode, they tend to focus on the here and now rather than on long-term needs," he said at a recent breakfast meeting sponsored by UJA Federation's Israel Now Consortium.

"Post traumatic stress disorder [PTSD] is becoming a society-wide phenomenon in Israel. The public is constantly bombarded by the sight of terror, violence and disasters through the media, which increase the effects of trauma," he said.

Terrorist attacks, he said, can change people's lives directly and indirectly.

"In the [restaurant] attacks that took place in the heart of Jerusalem, there were the dozens of wounded who had to cope not only with severe injuries, but also with the psychological trauma. Relatives and friends of the dead and injured had to suddenly deal with new realities in their lives."

These people need trained therapists they can talk to, Brom said, "but there are just not enough. We need to teach therapists the focus method of trauma treatment in which we focus on what has happening, and stop interpreting [events].

"Interpretation is not needed in this field. People need to talk about their horrors and let the process develop. Therapists should help their patients regulate their bodily functions, and allow them to go back and revisit their most horrific memories," he said.

The Latner Centre is set to open a walk-in crisis centre, Brom said, so people have a place to go when they need help dealing with their trauma.

"I got the idea when I was invited to a meeting in which an agency was discussing setting up a psychological emergency room which would remain open for eight hours after a terrorist incident.

"That never got off the ground, but the idea was typical Israeli – to help out immediately and then close shop. Again, it has to do with survival mode. People live by the day and take care of immediate needs. The whole idea of long-term process must be built in."

The new centre represents a whole new concept for Israelis, he said. "Whenever someone comes in, there will be someone available to talk. They will deal with all types of crises, including domestic violence, which is increasing due to the tension in the country."

Danny Brom

Brom said he and his staff are also starting programs in schools "where services are lacking.

"Too often, people are given the message that children are fine, that they have bounced back after a crisis."

They began working in schools at the beginning of the intifadah more than two years ago, he said, "in order to try and create a good environment for children to speak about whatever they need to speak about.

"We discovered that 66 per cent of children in Jerusalem schools know someone who was injured or killed in a bombing. That is a huge exposure."

They also learned that 11 per cent of children need services, he said. "[The rest] may cope well, but these 11 per cent have severe symptoms that impede functioning.

"This can turn into a long-term disorder in which they have flashbacks, are tense, are pre-occupied and have a diminished capacity to learn. This is a real threat to their development."

His staff has prepared treatment modules in which educational psychologists teach the children grieving techniques.

"The children are also taught to confront things that are occupying them. Children and adults tend to avoid memories. When they are able to regulate arousal of these memories, we can help children to integrate them," he said.

They are in the process of training teachers, guidance counsellors and principals to work with children, Brom said.

"The only way to protect a society under threat of terrorism is to educate people and build resilience. Communities must get their act together and have good treatment programs ready for when they are needed. Canada can learn from this as well."

In the past year, Brom said, a coalition of agencies has been formed in Israel "so we can get out of the competition between organizations. Six hospitals in the coalition are working together to develop a protocol about what to do after a bombing.

"They are also working together on the 'helping the helpers' program, in which they offer psychological help to members of emergency teams that go out to the sites of terrorist attacks.

"These people suffer a lot of burnout. We need to help sustain the teams."

Feeling for music runs deep as Kuerti family takes the stage

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Kristine Bogyo is passionate about music. Her voice rises when she explains that music is like the air she breathes, filling her nose and ears and pores, invigorating the soul and stimulating the mind.

She wants the world, especially young people, to share that intensity.

Torontonians can share the musical passion, when Bogyo's Mooredale Concerts puts on Cellisimo!, an eight-cello performance Feb. 22 and 23, at Willowdale United Church and University of Toronto's Walter Hall respectively.

Bogyo, a veteran cellist, will be joined by her sons, cellist Rafael Kuerti and conductor Julian Kuerti. Her husband, pianist Anton Kuerti, will watch the unique string performance.

The family feeling for music runs deep, Bogyo says, because music has always been a staple in the Kuerti home. She even met Anton in a musical setting: when 19-year-old Bogyo filled in for a CBC orchestra cellist, Anton was the piano soloist. Their eyes met over the music stands and the two fell in love shortly thereafter.

Julian Kuerti

CBC recently produced an hour-long documentary about the couple. A Marriage in Music, which debuted last month, detailed their love of playing, performing and discussing the discipline that brought them together.

The family's commitment to classical music extends to their children. When Rafael, now 21, was five, Bogyo bought him a quarter-size cello and he fell in love with the instrument. She once took nine-year-old Julian, now 26, to a Shostakovich symphony and "he was riveted. Unlike most kids his age, he didn't move an inch," she says.

Her sons were never forced into music, she stresses, adding that her goal was to foster a love of the arts. She believes children should be exposed to classical music early.

"Classical music lets you connect with the composer," she says, "and you can listen to him talk to you."

Kristine Bogyo

In 1986, Bogyo began to convey that musical spirituality to young people when she founded Mooredale Concerts, an enterprise that enables young musicians to practise and perform.

The idea of a youth orchestra arose from her frustration in trying to find a forum for nine-year-old Julian's talent as a violinist. There were no places for young musicians in Toronto, she says, and she started Mooredale to give them a place to hone their talents.

Thirty kids enrolled "practically overnight" and now Mooredale boasts a roster of 120 from six to 20 years old. Well-known Mooredale graduates include opera singer Russell Braun and violinist Martin Beaver.

Rafael Kuerti

Boygo's sons followed their own artistic dreams. Julian began as a classical and jazz violinist, even travelling to Brazil to play with his band Kahana. He has been studying conducting since January 2000, most recently completing a master's degree at the University of Berlin under the tutelage of Maestro Lutz Kohler.

Rafael has played with Mooredale, the Toronto Symphony Youth Orchestra and the Boris Brott National Academy Orchestra. He is studying music at U of T, but his tastes also include hip-hop, where he creates cello-influenced beats for his group, The Red Army.

"It's important to see variety in music," he says, "and we shouldn't write off something supposedly uninteresting."

Rafael emphasizes that musical integrity is key, from the technique of a cello solo to the harmonies of a rap beat.

Memories and Testimonies:

Exhibition contrasts Shoah's impact on victims and its descendants

By MIRIAM CHINSKY
Special to The CJN

Memories and Testimonies — Experiencing Discrimination and Displacement, at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery until March 6, is a Holocaust-related exhibition that contrasts the Shoah's impact on its victims with the secondhand experience of their descendants.

Featured are works in various media by artists who have emigrated from Europe since World War II: Marcel Braitstein, Eva Brandl, Caroline Dukes, Georges Dyens, David Feist, Angela Grossman, Sadko Hadzihasanovic, Natalka Husar, Gershon Iskowitz and Graham Metson.

Condemned by Polsih born Gershon Iskowitz.

Curated by Concordia University professor and art historian Dr. Loren Lerner, the exhibit focuses on the effects of war, racism, political discrimination, displacement. It comes to Toronto after showing at Concordia and Carleton University galleries.

Polish born Gershon Iskowitz (1921-1988) was a witness to the depravities of Buchenwald and Auschwitz. Scrounging such materials as brown paper, cardboard and ersatz coffee, he furtively recorded the brutal scenes and, risking death if they were discovered, concealed them under the barracks' floorboards.

Condemned, salvaged from Buchenwald, is the haunting portrait of an emaciated man, filled with dread yet harbouring a contained fury because he has been selected to die.

Iskowitz continued to develop such images following his release from the camp and after arriving in Toronto. But he later turned to passionately-coloured, abstract aerial landscapes. Two of his Holocaust works hang in the National Gallery of Canada in Ottawa.

While victims inhabited Iskowitz' memory, Angela Grossman's figures project self-worth.

Grossman, born in 1955 London, is the daughter of a German Jew who survived the Holocaust because his parents sent him to England on a kindertransport (children's transport) while they remained behind. He rarely spoke about his past or the family that died in Europe.

Almost entirely cut off from her father's previous life, the artist has found her personal expression. In Stand 2000, a 13-year-old girl on the threshold of life looks out with penetrating eyes and a sense of challenge. She appears to be of the present, yet there are links to the past. Below her is part of a lace garter, a scrap of newspaper and in the foreground, a fringed serviette with small but disturbing red stains. Grossman searched in European flea markets for remnants of an earlier era, perhaps longing for a connection to the relatives she never knew.

Born in 1935, sculptor Marcel Braitstein and his half-brother were hidden for five years by a devout Protestant family in the coal mining town of Charleroi after the Nazis invaded Belgium.

Terrified by bombings and death in the streets, the little boy had recurring nightmares. In subsequent years at the movies, he would watch newsreels of the death camps, scrutinizing them, attempting to find the face of his father, killed at Auschwitz.

Braitstein's series, Fossiles, is striking. Instead of making a mold to reproduce an existing object, he forms the base for the actual sculpture from clay, then presses into it and/or layers over it natural and man-made items until it has the look and feel of a fossil.

His Fossile 886 combines a gas mask with branches and bugs embedded in the clay. This dates back to the war years when gas masks were issued but never used. None was made to fit children, something Braitstein found fearful.

The artists represented in Memories and Testimonies are a deeply understanding cross-section. This is a major exhibition.

The gallery's director is Judi Schwartz.

Memorial and Testimonies is at the Justina M. Barnicke Gallery, Hart House, University of Toronto, until March 6. http://www.toronto.ca/gallery/

Kuerti family stars in Cellisimo!

Bogyo also talks about quality music, stressing the difference between entertainment and art. Entertaining music, usually radio-rotation tunes, is mostly ear candy, she says.

Classical music is closer to a sublime experience, in which "after the concert, you feel richer, you feel like a better person.

"Mooredale is my contribution to bring out that love of beauty."

Why the eight cellos this weekend, when one or two usually suffice in a strings arrangement?

"People are going to be amazed," Bogyo says. "They assume cellos play the deep bass lines, but at the concert they will hear a cello playing high violin parts."

The audience can also expect lively tunes from Brazilian composer Villa-Lobos, who infuses his compositions with dance rhythms. Young soprano Jennifer Rasor will sing English, French and German arias.

With the three-pronged family connection, will the performance have added significance?

"I don't know," Rafael admits, "because I've never performed in public with my mother before."

Ever the passionate professional, Bogyo says, "When I play, I forget who I'm playing with and who's conducting. I'm totally focused on the music."

Young actor stands tall among adults in Falsettos

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

You would never know from his command of the musical genre that this is the first time actor Ryan Peters, 11, has performed with grownups.

His vocal and acting talent has him standing tall among the adult actors with whom he appears in Scarborough Music Theatre's production of Falsettos this weekend, Feb. 20-22 at the Scarborough Village Theatre, 3600 Kingston Rd.

The Toronto youngster, whose previous credits come from his school plays at the Bathurst campus of United Synagogue Day School, plays the role of Jason, the 11-year-old son of Marvin and Trina in Falsettos.

"Falsettos has an interesting story line," Ryan says. "It's about a man who has a family – my mother and me – and then he decides he wants to leave the family for a male lover. In the second act the play is about how they all come together for their son's bar mitzvah. I like Jason because he's kind of funny. It is a really big role. There are some funny show tunes and dancing numbers in it."

Ryan Peters

Ryan has never taken formal acting or singing lessons, but attributes learning his craft to his performing in Act One Productions at Yorkwoods Library Theatre since he was eight years old. His credits include Joseph and the Amazing Technicolor Dreamcoat, Annie, Beauty and the Beast and Fiddler on the Roof.

The young actor was well-prepared to take on the role of Jason.

"It's kind of weird, but I had the soundtrack four months before I auditioned. That helped a lot. At the beginning, it was hard to learn the songs, but after this many rehearsals it has become a natural thing.

"I would do my homework right after school and finish by six. Then I had free time for rehearsals and the performances. I'm really lucky. The cast, choreographer, musical director and stage director are all great. They don't treat me like I'm 11. They treat me like one of them."

The youngster isn't the only one in the family drawn to the performing arts. Ryan says his sister Danielle, eight, is quite the dancer and his father Gordy lends his talents to the annual adult play put on by Act One Productions.

Actor Matthew Broderick is Ryan's inspiration. He was fortunate enough to catch Broderick on Broadway in The Producers.

When not performing, Ryan enjoys a round of golf. He plans a career as a professional stage actor.

His next role is in May as the Tin Man in CharActors Theatre Troupe presentation of The Wizard of Oz. He's also planning to audition for the Scarborough Music Theatre's production of Oliver in the fall.

For tickets to Falsettos call 416-396-4049.

Ilan Ramon was a role model documentary shows

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon described Col. Ilan Ramon – the Israeli astronaut who perished when the Columbia space shuttle recently broke up in the sky over Palestine, Texas – in glowing, heart-felt words.

He was, Sharon declared at an emotional ceremony marking the return of his remains to Israel, a symbol and a role model. As Sharon put it, Ramon was "the reflection of Israel as its best, Israel as we would have liked to see it, the Israel we love."

A 48-year-old former Israeli Air Force pilot who took part in the 1981 bombing of Iraq's nuclear reactor near Baghdad, Ramon joined the NASA space program in 1997 as a payload specialist.

Israelis took pride in the fact that Ramon – the subject of a recent Vision TV interview in the faith series Jewish Sparks – was Israel's first astronaut.

And when he was killed along with six Americans as the Columbia blew up on re-entry to earth, Israel was thrown into national mourning.

In the Vision TV interview, taped during his preparations for the 16-day mission, Ramon expressed pleasure in being able to represent Israel in outer space.

Ramon talked about his scientific project of collecting images of dust storms, research designed to benefit all the peoples of the Middle East.

He spoke of the mushy kosher meals he would consume – "not your mother's gefilte fish," he quipped.

Having consulted rabbis, he said he would try to do "something traditional" on the Sabbath, though he was hard-pressed for time.

Realizing that the mission meant so much to his fellow Israelis, Ramon said he hoped to give them "some happiness" in these hard times.

Most touchingly, perhaps, Ramon, the son of a Holocaust survivor, told of an invaluable keepsake he had in his pocket when he boarded Columbia.

It was a pencil drawing of earth as seen from the moon's inhospitable landscape. The drawing, made by a teenage boy who was murdered in Auschwitz, was forever lost, as was Ramon, when the Columbia tragically disintegrated in a ball of fire.

ROCK BAND REVA L'SHEVA LAUNCHES DYNAMIC NEW JEWISH LEARNING FACILITY

The popular Jewish rock band Reva L'sheva is set to perform this week in Toronto to launch The House, an innovative new non-profit Jewish learning initiative for young people.

The House will offer nightly interactive discussions and courses on Jewish subjects led by dynamic educators, according to its founder, Rabbi Rafi Lipner, a teacher at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

Located at 469 Eglinton Ave. W., The House is currently undergoing renovations thanks to several generous donors, with programs scheduled to start in March. Programming will be geared to young adults from 17 to 24 years old.

"We want Jewish young adults to fall in love with Judaism," Rabbi Lipner said. "If they don't feel a passion for it, they won't make a commitment to it, and we'll lose them. That's why we've created a comfortable, relaxed, neighbourhood atmosphere, away from institutional settings, for Jews from all backgrounds to learn about Judaism's magnificent richness."

Reva L'sheva perform at The Reverb, 651 Queen St. W. on Thursday, Feb. 20, 8 p.m. Tickets are $12 in advance, $15 at the door. 416-569-6647.

Artloggia helps young artisits gain exposure

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Art today is a lot more accessible than it was in the past – it's on the Internet, in restaurants and in business offices.

Artloggia increases that accessibility. Established in the summer of 2002, Artloggia helps talented young artists gain exposure through public and private exhibitions and through their Web site, www.artloggia.com.

A group exhibit of three artists arranged by Artloggia will be on display until March at the Free Times Café at 320 College St.

The exhibit features the work of artists Ilona Jaffe, Yana Movchan and Adi Zur.

Jaffe lives and works in Dorset, England, where she creates oil paintings, monotypes and tapestries. Her works of people and flowers are in the style of Chagall and Mattise.

Movchan was trained at the Ukraine Art Academy in Kiev and has exhibited in the United States and Canada, and is exhibiting several oils on canvas of cats and roosters.

Zur, who was born in Israel and graduated from the Academy of Arts Teachers in Tel Aviv, also graduated from the Ontario College of Art and Design. Currently living in Toronto, Zur is exhibiting encaustic paintings which, she says, reflect the rich natural landscape of Israel that is her constant source of inspiration.

A wedding scene [By Ilona Jaffe]

Artloggia currently represents 27 artists from Europe and Canada and is growing. One of its partners, Claudiu Murgan, who writes science fiction and works for a consulting company, came to Canada from Bucharest, Romania, in 1997.

Murgan says he knew some artists in Europe and decided to bring their art here, sell it and send the money back to them.

"It began as a hobby and I thought it was a way to help the young artists," he said.

So he rented a lunch room in an office building and presented a successful art exhibition.

At the exhibit, he met Ruslana Zbagerska, a computer science student at Waterloo University. The two decided to team up and create Artloggia.

"We are very flexible because we don't have physical locations so our expenses are minimal," said Murgan. "Our goal is to promote as many artists as possible.

"We are opening doors for artists who need help in order to establish their reputations and to enter a more professional realm."

He said Arloggia has not made any money.

"It is a labour of love. Most artists have European roots. They bring their individual history with them.

"Along with helping the artists, we want to encourage people to purchase original art. It helps the artists and it help individuals to enrich their lives with art pieces that are made with love and passion."

The Free Times Café is the longest running folk club in Toronto and has featured thousands of nights of music, Judy Perly, the club's proprietor, said at the exhibition's opening.

"I believe in culture. Although the economic base is the restaurant, over the years, music has become very important."

Perly has run the Free Times Café for 22 years and is also an artist who graduated with a degree in fine arts from York University.

For information on future Artloggia exhibitions and to view their artists, visit www.artloggia.com or call 416-737-4614. For information on the Free Times Café exhibition, call 416-967-1078.

Flag football team heads for World Cup

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel says it has entered its strongest team yet in the World Cup of flag football, to be held in the Bahamas from Feb. 20 to Feb. 22.

This is the second time Israel has sent a team to the annual tournament, which brings together the top flag football players in the world.

Last year, Israel finished sixth out of seven countries, defeating England before losing to the United States, Mexico, and Venezuela. This year, 14 countries will take part and Israeli team officials believe they have a chance of finishing in the top five.

"Last year we were new to flag football, and it was our first international tournament," said Steve Leibowitz, president of American Football in Israel.

"We arrive this year with three tournaments under our belt, including a third-place finish in Europe. We have also gained a great deal of experience in pulling flags, and that is crucial," added coach Stu Berger.

The Israeli team is sponsored by the Jewish dating service jdate.com and the One Family Fund.

Unlike other national teams events, the flag football team combines sport with meeting local Jewish communities. Last summer, the Israeli team was in Toronto for Flag Bowl 2002, a tournament sanctioned by the Global Federation of American Football and held at York University.

Members of the team visited synagogues and community agency offices during the tournament, which saw them finish with a 0-4 record.

Team organizer Danny Gewirtz said that before travelling to the Bahamas, the team will spend two days in south Florida to participate in a number of local Jewish community programs.

"The highlight of our stay is a fundraising event for One Family to raise money for victims of terrorism," he said.

Miami Beach Mayor David Dermer, brother of Israeli quarterback Ron Dermer, is sponsoring the event.

CHAT fundraiser a fun ski day

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) will hold its first ever Ski and Snowboard Day on Tuesday Feb. 25 at the Alpine Ski Club in Collingwood.

As many as 200 students, alumni, friends and family members are expected to participate in the day-long ski party, said CHAT spokesperson Julie Gonik.

"It's a fundraising and a friendship-raising event," she said.

A full day of festivities are planned, including skiing, snowboarding, snow-shoeing, "bump (instruction) lessons," races and snowboarding demonstrations. Kosher breakfast, lunch and a snack are included and participants will also get to bid on a silent auction for a variety of merchandise donated by CHAT supporters, Gonik said.

The ski and snowboard event, which coincides with a professional development day, marks a departure from traditional CHAT fundraising events by incorporating an outdoor family fun component, Gonik said.

A fundraising goal of $20,000 has been set and money raised will go to the CHAT Student Support Fund, a pool of money that "enhances student life" by helping students purchase books and by underwriting some of the school's more costly class trips, she said.

Coach transportation to the club departs from the Promenade Mall at 7:15 a.m. and returns around 6:00 p.m.

For more information, contact Gonik at 416-636-5984, ext. 350.

The chair of CHAT's ski day program, Peter Seligman (centre), is flanked by his children Dani (left) and Corbin.

Israel forfeits two games, finishes last in IIHF tourney

CJN News Services

In a blow that stunned the Israeli junior hockey team, International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF) officials stripped the team of its first two victories in an international tournament held earlier this month.

The IIHF ruled that three players representing Israel at the 2003 IIHF World Under 18 Championship, Division III Group B in Sarajevo, Bosnia-Herzegovina, were ineligible.

According to the IIHF Web site, the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel had registered and played ineligible players, contravening IIHF bylaws.

After recording wins against Bosnia-Herzegovina and Iceland with the participation of ineligible players, the games were judged to be forfeited by the championship directorate and the scores were recorded as 5-0 in favour of Bosnia-Herzegovina and Iceland, respectively.

The tournament directorate said the participation of Ziv Zukiar, Aaron Zimner and Michael Lubinsky, who are all dual Israeli and Canadian citizens who live in Toronto, breached bylaw 204 of the IIHF Statues and Bylaws. The bylaw states that players with multiple citizenships must prove they have participated for at least two consecutive years in the national competitions of the country they wish to represent.

Bylaw 204 also requires the member national association to submit an application to the IIHF with all relating evidence at least four weeks before the competition in which the players will participate.

The case will be investigated by the IIHF's disciplinary committee for possible further action against the Israeli national association.

The four-team championship was won by Iceland, followed by Turkey, Bosnia-Herzegovina and Israel. Iceland was promoted to the 2004 IIHF World U18 Championship Division II.

Israel won its third game, defeating Turkey 5-4 , and would have finished the tournament undefeated if not for the game forfeitures.

The Israeli juniors were recently in Toronto for a mini-training camp and goodwill tour in which the team played several exhibitions against local high school and select teams.

The quest for spirituality

By JODI KOVITZ

As we go through the process of exploring ourselves as 20-somethings, we are likely validating ourselves as Jews in the process. We ask ourselves such questions as, "Who am I as a Jew? Why do I or do I not engage in Jewish ritual? Do I want more spirituality or guidance in my life? If so, how do I get it? Do I look to Jewish law or Jewish culture or both?"

I don't think these questions are unique to today's 20-something Jews. It seems that Jews of all ages have struggled with the nature of Jewish identity for as long as we have existed as a people. We come from a rich and interpretive tradition that encourages questions.

However, I think these questions are particularly pressing for our generation of 20-somethings. Our society is changing. It seems as if we are constantly fighting for our safety, as individuals and as a people. We are fighting terrorism worldwide. We are fighting anti-Semitism. How do we deal with these threats? Do we turn away from our Jewish values or use them to guide and support us and our community?

We also live in an age of increasing Jewish options. You can choose to practise Judaism in the egalitarian, Conservative-egalitarian, Reform, Conservative, Orthodox, modern Orthodox or Liberal traditions, or you can be non-denominational. When there are so many options out there, should we continue with the traditions we followed when we were growing up or should we choose what type of Judaism works for us?

In the summer of 2002, I participated in Reviving Eden's weekend Soul Retreat (www.kolel.org/revivingeden). In the company of a diverse group of 20-somethings, I learned that I was not the only one who felt an urgency to explore and develop my Jewish identity.

During an intriguing group discussion, one person commented, "I am trying to fit myself into the spectrum, but I find I'm having difficulty finding a community that shares my exact values. I am a Zionist. I am a feminist. I am not very observant, but I feel empty when I read in English in synagogue. I know that I want to make a change in my self-identification as a Jew. I don't know where to start. I don't necessarily want to become Orthodox, but I want more. Is there an in-between? I am really struggling."

I recently reached out to a friend who is a ba'al tshuvah in order to gain a different perspective on some of these issues. I asked him why someone who grew up in a more liberal or conservative background might choose to become Orthodox.

My friend gave me some outstanding insights. He said people who are baalei tshuvah often make a commitment to "do the right thing." They seek morality through living by the Torah and its accompanying oral code, the Talmud. Some people, he said, become more religious in their search for truth, while others are looking for guidance in difficult times.

I plan to expand on these insights in my next column and share additional perspectives from readers on "the quest for spirituality." Many of us feel we need to change how we identify as Jews, but don't know how or where to start. What are the options out there? How can one benefit by becoming more observant or more spiritual? How do we make time for spirituality in our busy lives? I welcome your insights at jlkovitz@hotmail.com.

BBQ ROASTED SALMON

1/4 cup pineapple juice
2 tblsp. fresh lemon juice
4 (6 oz) salmon fillets
2 tblsp. brown sugar
4 tsp. chili powder
2 tsp. grated lemon rind
3/4 tsp cumin
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. cinnamon cooking spray
lemon wedges (optional)

Combine first 3 ingredients in a plastic bag, seal and marinate in refrigerator 1 hour, turning occasionally.
Preheat oven to 400°F. Remove fish from bag; discard marinade. Combine sugar and next 5 ingredients in a bowl. Rub over fish. Place in an 11x7" baking dish coated with cooking spray. Bake at 400°F for 12 minutes or until fish flakes easily when tested with a fork. Serve with lemon, if desired. Serves 4.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Does the word "secular" have meaning in the 21st century? Does it maintain the force it once possessed in the modern world?

Day schools have traditionally divided curricula between secular and Jewish studies, but I never favoured that distinction. On the other hand, Jewish schools that promote an integrated program see the sacred potential in every subject area and attempt to teach one unified worldview in which Torah and technology do not compete, but rather complement each other.

However, even the schools that distinguish clearly between kodesh (holy) and chol (secular) must realize in this new century that math and science are sacred subjects with the potential for repairing the world under the kingship of God. Just the mere observation and experimentation in a biology class is evidence of "How great are Your works, God, all crafted in wisdom!" What is secular about saving a life with advanced medical science or seeking justice in a courtroom?

But what about secular Jews, the product of 19th- and 20th-century modern rationalism? We are given to believe that a great majority of Israelis still consider themselves chiloni (secular) and practise a lifestyle devoid of spirituality. While I have great respect and intellectual admiration for a truly secular Jew and hope that more secular Jews can find a way to connect to their Judaism culturally and through Jewish literacy, I seriously doubt there are many left. When you scratch the surface, you find that many so-called secular Jews in Israel are Sephardim who have traditional lifestyles, others who still care about brit milah and mezuzot (not exactly rational mitzvot!) and others who are spiritual seekers.

Rabbi Abraham Kook was prophetic when he said, "Let the new become holy and the holy become new."

Epi (Seymour Epstein) is the vice-president of Jewish Education at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The Registry at William Ashley

Beautiful China, Crystal, Silver & Gifts at Famous Savings

THE TOP 10 REASONS TO REGISTER AT WM. ASHLEY

SELECTION: With over 4,000 patterns, William Ashley offers North America's largest selection of china, crystal, silver and gifts to suit your personal style. No other store is able to offer a more extensive selection.

VALUE: Being Canada's Largest Tableware and Giftware retailer, William Ashley is able to offer you and your guests consistently great values on the famous names you know and respect.

PERSONALIZED SERVICES: Our knowledgeable registry consultants look forward to assisting you in creating fabulous table settings and accessories that reflect your combined tastes and new lifestyle. Your consultant will personally record your selections on our computer, and continue to work closely with you throughout your entire registry.

CONVENIENCE: Your guests can either shop in person at one of our two locations or simply phone us and we will assist them in selecting that perfect gift from your registry selections. We also offer toll-free service for your out-of-town guests, as well as computer internet access to your personal registry web site.

IN-STOCK: Wm. Ashley carries more patterns in-stock on an everyday basis than anyone else. This means that your selection will usually be available for your guests to take with them.

COMPUTERIZED REGISTRY LISTINGS: When you register, your selection will be recorded in our computerized Bridal Registry. We can advise your family and friends of your personal preferences. This reduces duplication by ensuring everything you receive is your personal choice.

UNIQUE DESIGNS: We bring you an unequalled selection of famous manufacturers from around the world, many of which are available only at William Ashley.

COMPLIMENTARY SERVICES: We offer our registered couples a wide range of special services, all provided without charge. Free registry consultations, free gift notification service, free gift wrapping, free delivery and many others.

GOURMET SHOPPE: We carry a complete selection of everything you will need for your kitchen. From pots and pans to electric appliances, kitchen knives, cookware and every gadget you can imagine; Wm. Ashley has it all under one roof.

INTERNET ACCESS: As part of our special services to our registered couples, your guests will be able to view your requests from the comfort of their home and make a selection of their choice. Each couple will be issued a personal web site address to give to your friends and family for their convenience.

Sciarrino legacy continues at Horvath's new location

With a view to upgrading their already legendary customer service, Horvath Photography is moving to a new location — in a fine century home on Centre Street in Thornhill.

The new studio has the atmosphere of a family home from a more genteel time: spacious high-ceilinged rooms with pane windows and shutters; hardwood, pine and old-style flooring. In warm weather, you'll enjoy the opportunity for outdoor shoots on Horvath's very own facilities, with special sets for unique portraits. This ambience is warm and inviting, yet casual and easy-going — ideal for portraiture.

Horvath Photography has a reputation for excellence at weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs and other festive occasions. But they're especially known for refined, sensitive portraits of children and adults of all ages, both individuals and families.

By its very nature, Sciarrino points out, a portrait requires great care in everything from lighting control to choice of apparel. At Horvath Photography, your photographer gives you the time and care to make sure that everything comes out just right.

"Our reputation has been built, over several decades, on a commitment to work of lasting value," Sciarrino states. "For portraits to celebrate a milestone event, nothing less is acceptable. Hand in hand with this approach, we bring you the best of the new technology."

"Our name is well established," continues Sciarrino, who has headed the company since 1994, "but we've never rested on our laurels. We're young in spirit, growing and evolving. The basic principle hasn't changed: to offer you the best work possible. That means the best for today, for 2003."

Horvath Photography's weddings are now almost all digital, their portraits entirely so. Digital technology is easier to use at an event; it lets you see the work as soon as it's done, and it's easier to manipulate images to achieve the desired effect.

Sciarrino's credentials include Master's degrees in photography from Canada and the U.S., and many awards. His best credentials, though, are his photographs.

You'll find Horvath Photography in their new home at 24 Centre St., just west of Yonge, with free parking on the premises. Studio hours are Tuesday to Friday from 9:30 to 5:00, Saturdays by appointment.

For distinguished avant-garde photography with enduring value, Horvath remains the photographer of choice.

Memories Begin Here

Be Part of Tradition

Weddings have been part of the Estates of Sunnybrook for almost three-quarters of a century. Thousands of couples have chosen to celebrate their special day at the elegant Vaughan Estate, McLean House or the Coach House.

Vaughan Estate
Elizabethan Elegance

J.J. Vaughan, the original owner, started the tradition of weddings at Vaughan Estate, then known as Donningvale. Today, Vaughan Estate is newly restored and refurbished yet retains all the original heritage character. The signature rooms at Vaughan Estate can hold a reception for up to 160 guests and the Wedding Arbour on the Estate's grounds is quite simply the ideal location for your outdoor ceremony.

McLean House
Georgian Grace

From lush, manicured gardens to elegant rooms with a view, McLean House provides everything for the ideal ceremony and reception. Originally known as BayView and dating to 1929, McLean House offers a selection of signature rooms, each one decorated to reflect the style and ambience of this graceful Georgian manor.

Coach House
A Very Special Place

For couples wishing a more intimate wedding, the Coach House offers the perfect venue for up to 40 guests.

We're Here To Help

From the traditional to the original, our team is here to help you plan the wedding of your dreams. Specializing in exceptional personalized service, the Estates' wedding team is committed to ensuring that your day is exactly how you imagined it.

By choosing the Estates, you know that your investment in your wedding is directed towards furthering vital research at Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 5, 2003 at Beth Emeth Synagogue. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Ritché Couture will be presenting their 2003 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centre-pieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

The Art of Memories

Turn your special moments into exquisite works of art.

The "Simcha Glass"
Take the ancient tradition of the "breaking of the wedding glass" and turn it into a memory you'll cherish forever. We take the actual broken glass from your wedding ceremony and suspend the shards in the form of the glass in a Lucite® column. Each piece is hand-cast and custom made for you. We finish it off with your choice of edges and engrave your name and wedding date.

We also offer a unique way to showcase your invitations and photos.

Iranian Jews released

By AMIRAM BARKAT
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The last five Jews imprisoned in Iran on charges of spying for Israel were released from jail last Wednesday night.

The five were among the 13 Jews of Shiraz arrested for spying in 1999, of whom 10 were convicted and sentenced to a maximum of 13 years in jail. The sentence had been reduced to a maximum of nine years after an appeal. Throughout the hearings, the judge also acted as prosecutor.

Bar Osher, chair of the Committee to Save the Jews of Iran, described the release as a holiday and said the decision demonstrated the success of his group's efforts.

"Our tactic, to act through friendly nations headed by the United States, has proven itself," Osher said last Wednesday night. "Just yesterday, U.S. President [George W.] Bush mentioned Iran in his speech, and it wasn't by accident."

Five accused of spying for Israel

Last month, a European Union delegation visited Iran to investigate its human rights record, and a United Nations delegation is in the country now, Israel Radio analyst Menashe Amir said.

Protests from Israel and other countries began almost as soon as the arrests were publicized. Then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak denied that the detainees had ever spied for Israel. Some feared Iran would execute the Jews, a concern reinforced by the stated intentions of some Iranian officials. Following massive international pressure, the defendants were sentenced to jail terms instead.

The last hearing in the two-month trial was held in June 2000 and ended with eight suspects confessing, four denying charges, and one admitting to collecting military information for the Mossad but denying he ever gave it to them. Some of those who confessed did so on national television, but four who had previously confessed withdrew their confessions about a month later, saying their admissions of guilt were made under intense pressure from Iranian authorities.

Shinui, NRP join coalition

By YOSSI VERTER and NADAV SHRAGAI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Shinui party leader Yosef "Tommy" Lapid said Monday on Army Radio that Prime Minister Ariel Sharon had sent him a letter committing Likud to follow U.S. President George W. Bush's "road map" for peace in the Middle East – with the dozens of adjustments proposed by Likud last week.

The secular Shinui signed an agreement with Likud early Monday morning indicating that Shinui would join a coalition government and get five portfolios, including the Justice Ministry, which Lapid is expected to take.

MK Avraham Poraz will head the Interior Ministry, and another Shinui lawmaker will fill the deputy minister's post in the same department. Shinui members will also fill posts in the National Infrastructure, Environment and Science ministries.

In addition, Lapid will serve as deputy prime minister and Shinui representatives will head two Knesset committees.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Libel Suit Dismissed

VANCOUVER — The wife of a former Alberta Aryan Nations leader lost a defamation lawsuit last week against the CBC over a 1996 TV news report that said she dressed their children in "pint-sized" Ku Klux Klan uniforms at a 1986 cross-burning rally in Hayden Lake, Idaho. A B.C. Supreme Court Judge ruled the CBC did not libel Janice Miller, even if she did not literally dress her children in Klan outfits. He found Miller's own remarks at a discovery hearing indicated she knew of the rally's racist nature and that she shared many of her husband's beliefs.

Terror List Additions

OTTAWA — Canada outlawed three more terrorist groups earlier this month, including the pro-Palestinian Abu Nidal group, which has carried out attacks that killed hundreds in pursuit of its goal to destroy Israel. The other two are the Al Qaeda-linked Abu Sayyaf Group in the Philippines and the Peru-based Sendero Luminoso, or Shining Path, putting the number of banned groups on Canada's anti-terrorism list at 19. The 19 groups' assets in Canada can be seized, and anyone belonging to, or helping them, faces up to 10 years in prison. The Canadian Jewish Congress has also been lobbying Ottawa to add two Palestinian groups, the Tanzim militias and the Al-Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, to the list.

ISRAEL

Ethiopian Aliyah

JERUSALEM — Israel's cabinet last week approved a plan to immediately bring some 18,000 Falash Mora from Ethiopia. The plan was proposed by Interior Minister Eli Yishai after a call by the spiritual leader of the haredi Shas Party to "save the souls" of the Falash Mora, whose ancestors converted from Judaism to Christianity in the 19th century. Most of the Falash Mora say they have returned to Judaism. The plan reverses existing policy, which calls for Ethiopian immigrants to be brought to Israel gradually, based on the Law of Return and family reunification efforts.

El Al IPO in May

JERUSALEM— El Al will sell a 49 per cent ownership stake in a public offering in May. The Israeli government will retain majority control of the national airline for the time being, but the other 51 per cent of the shares will be sold at some point in the future, said El Al's president, Amos Shapira. The public offering is in line with a government decision about a year ago to privatize the airline, Shapira said. Even after all shares are sold, the government will be able to commandeer El Al planes in a national emergency, but shareholders would be able to reconsider El Al's policy of not flying on Shabbat, he said.

Results Recovered

JERUSALEM — More than 80 per cent of the results of Israeli experiments conducted aboard the space shuttle Columbia were relayed to Earth prior to its disintegration. A report published last week by the Israel Space Agency and scientists from Tel Aviv University and Open University said much of the data was relayed to Earth in real time. The report said the data yielded a number of important scientific findings, including photographs of lightning formed at high altitudes and dust movement in the Middle East.

WORLD

Rabbi Appointed

NEW YORK — The United Jewish Communities has named Toronto native Rabbi Sheldon Zimmerman as vice-president of Jewish renaissance and renewal, one of UJC's four main areas of focus. The organization develops programs for the North American Jewish federation system to strengthen and enrich Jewish life. Rabbi Zimmerman most recently served as executive vice president of Birthright Israel and is a former president of the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College.

Jews Undercounted?

LONDON — About 267,000 Jews live in England and Wales, making them slightly less than 0.5 per cent of the total population, according to 2001 census data released Feb. 13. But researchers at London's Institute for Jewish Policy Research said the figure may be as much as one third too low because the census's religion question was voluntary. The researchers said the total figure could well be above 330,000.

Swiss Give Up

ZURICH — Swiss prosecutors said earlier this month they have given up on finding those responsible for the 2001 shooting death of 71-year-old Rabbi Abraham Greenbaum, the dean of a Bnei Brak yeshiva who was in Zurich on a fundraising mission when he was gunned down in the streets.

PA To Distribute Own Gas Masks, Court Says

JERUSALEM — Ismel's High Court of Justice last week rejected a petition calling on the state to distribute gas masks to all Palestinians.

The petition, brought by human rights groups, argued the army is in full control of the West Bank and Gaza and is therefore obliged to provide gas masks for all Palestinians in case of an attack by Iraq.

But the state argued that the military only enters Palestinians areas in cases of self-defence and had not imposed a full military takeover.

The state also noted that Israel had already decided to provide gas masks to any Palestinians living in areas under full Israeli control. But it said the PA is responsible for providing such services in areas under total Palestinian control.

The state also said if the PA requests gas masks in a case of real need, Israel would consider it, Army Radio reported.

Zundel at the centre of immigration controversy

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Ernst Zundel once gloated about the million dollars of free publicity his run-ins with the law provided him, but now it appears his name may have been in the papers one time too many for his own good.

Only days after media outlets picked up the story that U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service (INS) agents had arrested him at his home in Sevierville, Tenn., for a lapsed visa, a district court in Mannheim, Germany, issued a warrant for his arrest. Zundel could face up to five years in jail for inciting hatred through his Web site, said Heribert Adelt, press officer for the German embassy in Ottawa. If Zundel is deported to Germany, he will be arrested immediately on his arrival, Adelt added.

In recent weeks, Zundel has become increasingly familiar with the jail systems in North American cities, as he is bounced around, country to country, like a hot potato that nobody wants. He has spent the last few weeks behind bars as first the Americans held him for overstaying his visa and now Canadian authorities have him in custody in Thorold, Ont., while they try to determine what to do with him next.

Zundel, a native of Germany, had lived in Canada as a permanent resident from 1958 until the summer of 2000, but at that time, he sold his home and departed for the United States promising never to return.

By doing this, he appears to have lost his residency status. On being dumped in Canada by INS agents, he immediately claimed refugee status, alleging he faced persecution in Germany for his political beliefs.

Zundel was interviewed late last week by an immigration official, who will determine whether his case should proceed through the refugee determination process, but at press time, there was no indication whether his claim would begin a no-doubt lengthy traverse of the Canadian legal system. Zundel, meanwhile, retained lawyer Rocco Galati, who has represented Mahmoud Jaballah and others alleged to be associated with Middle Eastern terrorist groups.

At the same time, news reports indicated Canadian security officials were preparing a national security certificate that would declare Zundel a security threat – a procedure that could serve as grounds for his immediate removal despite his refugee claim.

Citizenship and Immigration Minister Denis Coderre suggested the Immigration and Refugee Protection Act gives him the authority to order an individual's removal before the refugee-determination process begins.

"Just watch me," Coderre said when asked what measures he might take.

Responding to questions in Parliament, Coderre declared, "I will not let the system be trampled on."

Speaking in question period, Alliance MP Diane Ablonczy pointed out that "refugee laws say that someone found to be inadmissible to Canada on grounds of security is ineligible to make a refugee claim. That is exactly what CSIS [Canadian Security Intelligence Service] and our courts have found Zundel to be – a threat to Canadian security. This is grounds to simply dismiss any refugee claim he might make and deport him, or the minister can leave the door wide open for Zundel to make a refugee claim and launch more litigation, all at Canada's expense."

Canadian Jewish Congress spokesperson Bernie Farber said Zundel is "making a sham of the refugee process… He is not being persecuted in Germany, but prosecuted."

Farber said Congress joined the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) last week in serving on Zundel court documents alleging he was in contempt of a Commission order that he remove content from his Web site that attacked Jews. Congress had been one of several intervenors in Commission hearings into whether Zundel's Web site violated the Canadian Human Rights Code by offering Internet messages that denigrated Jews. A tribunal determined, after Zundel left the country, that his Web site did in fact do so, and it ordered him to remove the offending material – something he ignored after moving to the United States.

By the end of last week, Zundel found himself much like the German army of the Nazi era he so eagerly defends – fighting a two-front war and rapidly running out of ammunition. His escape route to the United States has been shut: INS spokesperson Mike Gilhooly said Zundel is ineligible to return to the United States for 10 years. He faces jail in Germany on the new charges and jail in Canada if he remains and is convicted of contempt.

There is precedent for a Canadian conviction, Farber said. In the 1980s, longtime Nazi sympathizer John Ross Taylor spent two years in jail for refusing a CHRC order to stop offering telephone hate messages.

A Congress investigation indicates that of 33 specific documents the tribunal ordered Zundel to remove, 26 are still on the Web site, Farber said.

Lawyer Marshall Drukarsh, a specialist in immigration law, did not hold out much hope that Zundel would succeed in his refugee claim and he thought there was no chance he could revive his permanent residency status.

"The fact that someone fears prosecution never makes him a refugee," he said. "There's no way on God's green earth that anyone would have that fear."

Apocalypticism, Anti-Semitism and the historical Jesus: Subtexts in Criticism

Friday, March 7, 9 a.m.–5 p.m.
Trinity College, Larkin Building, George Ignatieff Theatre, 15 Devonshire Place

Did Jesus expect God to transform the cosmos, and why does this matter? What difference does it make that he was Jewish? Or the kind of Jew he was? These and other matters will be explored in a series of lectures and panel discussions. For more information, contact: jackmansymposium@hotmail.com or 416-978-6493.

The desert's 'mighty spirits'

In an attempt to counter the campaign being waged in some European and North American quarters to isolate Israeli authors and academics, The CJN reviews a work by an Israeli writer in this space in the last issue of each month.

From the editor's desk

Sand Devil (The Toby Press, 2001), a collection of three novellas by Michael Bornstein, is the literary equivalent of a blow to the solar plexus.

One frequently has to stop to catch one's breath, bowled over by the force and intensity of the narratives and by the unsparing detail of the author's keen-eyed descriptions.

The book takes its title from the first novella, a story about the coming of age, or some might say, the descent into desert dementia, of an adolescent boy, who, along with his unusual family, have settled in the Negev Desert in an attempt to recreate the way of life of the biblical patriarchs.

The family is transplanted from Chicago. The father is a stern, domineering, humourless, fundamentalist Christian who has imposed his uncompromising, harsh theological views upon his wife and children.

The characters are dark, brooding and unpredictable, much like the hard, rock-faced desert from which they must find sustenance.

One of the key creative tensions of the novella's plot is the underlying conflict between the adolescent, Bobby, and his father. Another tension, of course, is the conflict between the desert – its climate, topography and secrets – and the family.

Other characters, including an Israeli anthropologist, an occasional purveyor of supplies, and a misshapen, disfigured urchin-like mentor, complete the dramatis personae of the story.

The author's familiarity with the desert is evident in his powerful and nuanced descriptions.

"Like a hand held out for mercy, the valley stretches before me," Bornstein writes. "Veined with wadis and blistered with dunes. An ancient hand, older than Adam's. Yet mercy it never receives. Soon the rains will come, and the floods, slashing ravines and skinning the dust down to bedrock. Then, fiercest of all, the winds. Gritty pillars which shred the sand and eat it raw. Sucking and spitting. Sand devils, Iblis calls them, mighty spirits of hunger. Wondrous to watch, they can tear a man into pieces."

The desert occupies a central place in each of the book's novellas. In the first story, Sand Devil, the desert serves as both the context and the inspiration. In the second story, House of Bondage, the desert is an encroaching backdrop, a close-at-hand horizon on which the protagonist, Batya, constantly focuses from the safety of the apartment she inhabits by herself.

Single, without any prospects, and trapped in a routine that is monotonous and dull, Batya laments her life.

Then, one night, the desert intrudes into her home. An escaped convict from the penitentiary at the end of the horizon breaks into her home and holds her captive.

The story then heads in directions that are masterfully crafted and quite surprising. It unfolds as naturally as a summer hailstorm. You know it is possible but do not really expect it to happen.

In the book's final story, The Maestro of Yerucham, the desert is the geographical point of reference of the protagonist's home in Yerucham. He lives virtually alone, forgotten, on the edge of the desert, a far cry from the cosmopolitan existence he lived in his youth.

Roman Tolchowsky is a new immigrant to Israel from the former Soviet Union. Before World War II, he was a renowned European violin virtuoso, travelling throughout the cultural centres of western Europe. But the war killed Roman's family and wounded him and left him to languish for some 50 years in a sawmill in Siberia, haunted and diminished by harmful memories.

The story effectively integrates flashback with present tense. But Roman's life spins downward after he tries to tutor an obviously talented young student, the daughter of the most powerful man in Yerucham.

The author is a rare talent. Sand Devil attests to his prodigious skill as a writer of fiction. But his skills extend beyond fiction as well. Indeed, many of you will also know him by his skill as a writer of political commentary and analysis, and by his full name, Michael Bornstein Oren. His recently published book, Six Days of War: June 1976 and the Making of the Modern Middle East, has been nominated for a Pulitzer Prize.

Bornstein Oren is a senior fellow at the Shalem Center, a Jerusalem-based research facility, where he heads the Middle East history project. He was raised in New Jersey but now lives with his wife and three children in Jerusalem. A historian with degrees from Columbia and Princeton universities, he has been a Lady Davis Fellow at Hebrew University and a Moshe Dayan Fellow at Tel Aviv University.

Bornstein Oren served as officer in the Israeli Defence Forces and as an advisor to the Israel delegation to the United Nations and to the government of the late prime minister Yitzhak Rabin.

Sand Devil is provocative and sometimes even disturbing. But it is an exciting read. I recommend it effusively.

CRUSH THOSE GRAPES:

Torah Tots Pre-School recently had an unusual Brochot Fair. Every classroom offered a different "blessing" for foods. Activities included grape stomping, gingerbread baking, fruit shish kebobs, tree planting, mosaic Kiddush cup decorating, challah making and yeast experiments. Here Hallee Solomon enjoys grape stomping as she makes wine for her classmates.

Deadline set for Belgian Jews to file claims

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

A deadline of March 19 looms for Belgian Jews to file compensation claims for property and assets plundered during World War II.

Canadian Jewish Congress has issued a reminder to Jewish Holocaust survivors originally from Belgium, or their heirs, that the country's Indemnification Act, proclaimed in Dec. 2001, provides for compensation for the "plundered, surrendered or abandoned assets of the Belgian Jewish community during the Holocaust."

The law applies to those who were affected by wartime anti-Jewish measures or anti-Semitic acts committed by Nazi occupying forces; those who lived in Belgium at any time during the period of German occupation, May 10, 1940 to May 8, 1945; and those who had assets that were plundered in Belgium or assets they were forced to abandon.

CJC explains that if the victim has died, anyone who can prove a relationship in the first degree (children and parents of the deceased), second degree (siblings, grandchildren, grandparents) or third degree (great-grandchildren, great-grandparents, uncles, aunts, cousins) may file a claim in the name of the deceased.

Among those who have made a claim is Jacques Vogler of Toronto, who was born in Belgium and survived the Holocaust as a child by being hidden by a Catholic family.

"My father was a tailor and had a shop. So I'm asking for compensation for summer and winter clothing and bolts of cloth," he told The CJN. Vogler is also seeking compensation for family jewelry, furniture – even his old bicycle.

He hesitates to put a monetary value on the items. "Who knows? The point is, it was either confiscated or we had to leave it all behind."

Of the approximately 65,000 Jews in Belgium on the eve of World War II, roughly 40,000, or 60 per cent, perished, including Vogler's parents.

The Belgian law stresses that it only provides for compensation for material damage caused to goods and property. It does not provide for "moral damage due, for instance, to deprivation of liberty or deportation."

The law also refers to financial assets and goods that have not been restored by the government, financial institutions or insurance companies.

An earlier commission, whose findings formed the basis for the law, found that during the Nazi occupation of Belgium, assets in banks and financial institutions, although blocked, were generally not seized. As a result, most of them were still present at the time of the liberation.

Proceeds from the forced sales of businesses and real estate were also deposited in blocked accounts, and the same happened with the matured capital of insurance policies. The Belgians say the Nazis showed no interest in insurance policies.

However, the Belgian government says Nazis did seize furniture and household goods and transferred them to Germany. The commission was unable to assess the overall volume of this looting, for which compensation has never been paid.

The Nazis also seized artworks and cultural items, but the Belgian government has said they are taken into account only "to a very marginal extent" by the Indemnification Act. Investigations in this area continues.

Belgium says compensation for Belgium's many Jewish diamond dealers during the war is "virtually complete."

Claims should be sent by registered mail to: Chairman of the Indemnification Commission, rue de la Loi 16, 1000 Brussels, Belgium.

Claim forms and other details are available at: http://www.premier.fgov.be/topics/reports/rep_jewish-goods/commission_e.html.

Congress has written to Belgium's new ambassador to Canada, Daniel Leroy, expressing "grave concern" over the recent decision of the Belgian Supreme Court to allow the prosecution of foreign nationals not in Belgium for alleged war crimes, even if they did not involve Belgian citizens or were not committed on Belgian soil.

The ruling stems from a case against Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon that was brought two years ago by a group of Lebanese citizens. They charged him with war crimes in connection with his indirect role in the 1982 massacre of 800 Palestinians by Phalangist troops in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps outside Beirut while they were under Israeli control and Sharon was defence minister.

Last June, a Belgian appeals court ruled Sharon could not be tried in Belgium without him being in the country and because he has diplomatic immunity.

The Supreme Court, however, ruled he could be tried, but only after he leaves office and no longer has diplomatic immunity.

The court's decision, CJC wrote in a Feb. 14 letter to Leroy, "represents the culmination of a flawed and deeply politicized process that sanctions the Palestinian vendetta against Israeli leaders..."

Congress said if the "absurd law" permitting individuals to bring war crimes charges in Brussels "against their personal betes noires is not embarrassing enough to Belgium, the possibility of Belgian military personnel and political leaders being the subject of such trials for their historic actions, for example, in sub-Saharan Africa, ought to be."

Last week, CJC's Ottawa office received a reply from Leroy, saying he had received the Congress missive, and that it would be forwarded to authorities in Brussels. Leroy said he would be in touch "soon" to set a date for a meeting.

Grade 8 students from United Synagogue Day School's Bathurst campus went to St. Lawrence Market to help Ve'ahavta to pack food and prepare for the annual Beat the Blues Bash.

Ve'ahavta bash for homeless creates warm feelings

By JENNIFER M. PAQUETTE
Special to The CJN

Everybody keeps touching me.

It's the first thing I notice, arriving at Ve'ahavta's fourth annual Beat the Blues Bash for Toronto's homeless at St. Lawrence Market Feb. 12, and it's an impression that lingers for days afterward.

Organizer Sarah Zelcer adopts me, holding my arm, showing me around. Her touch draws me into a world where loving neighbours means erasing lines between "us" and "them," where "all who are hungry, come and eat" isn't just just a once-a-year slogan, it's a daily struggle and, like tonight, an occasional triumph.

"You have to meet Darryl," Zelcer says. Everybody says I have to meet Darryl, even his mother, Norma, who's handing out coats and mittens for bitter nights outdoors.

Temperatures downtown will dip to -15C tonight, and Beat the Blues offers warmth and light in a season that can be fatal.

When I joke that you can't exactly send out invitations to a party like this, Zelcer says Darryl has actually done just that, going into shelters, temporary residences, and churches and shuls that provide shelter to homeless people as part of the Out of the Cold program, rounding up all his contacts "on or near" the streets.

The message has apparently gotten through: close to 1,000 guests drop by over the course of four hours, queuing for mashed potatoes, hamburgers, sushi and cake and then settling in for music ranging from blaring rock guitars to a Native drumming circle.

There's also a small army of volunteers, more than 150 in all, including 40 United Synagogue Day School students. They're here from synagogues, churches and corporations, serving food, tidying up, smiling and telling me I must meet Darryl.

Zelcer was on the road at 7 a.m., rounding up supplies, but even as the party winds down, she's zipping around, showing off cards made by Bialik Hebrew Day School students for guests' gift bags – plus, she says,"The Body Shop has donated 1000 body scrubs!"

I wonder how many guests will have running water to use the body scrubs, or, for that matter, the toothpaste and hand cream, but Zelcer's idealism shines through: "Our only agenda is to have a nice time."

Police are also in attendance, but they're a benign hovering presence, snacking with the crowd.

Zelcer says Beat the Blues offers "something for the mind, body, heart and soul," like the winners book from an annual homeless creative writing contest.

"You should read my poem in there," a girl named Angel O'Conners tells me. When I check later, though, all the entries are nameless. I read the heartbreaking Death of an Angel and wonder if it's hers.

Her friend Moose, a big guy who is twisting wire hangers into art, tells me he entered a poem, but isn't sure it's in the book. He's selling his sculptures for $7.

Israeli media helped kill Oslo, professor says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel's newspapers and television stations played "a destructive role" in reporting on the now-defunct Oslo peace process, a Hebrew University media specialist says.

As Oslo unfolded, everything good about peace was not considered newsworthy, while everything bad about it got top billing, Gadi Wolfsfeld told a recent forum at the University of Toronto's Munk Centre for International Studies.

Overall, the Israeli news media's Oslo coverage was sensationalist and "hysterical," he said, adding that they appeared to show more interest in reaping profit than in generating conciliation among Jews and Arabs.

By contrast, the media in Northern Ireland have played a responsible and "much more positive role" in covering conflict, said Wolfsfeld, an associate professor of political science and communication who was delivering the Munk Centre's Ralph and Roslyn Halbert Visiting Scholar Lecture.

"In Israel, the media made a bad situation worse," he said, referring to the gradual collapse of the Oslo peace process due to Palestinian terrorism and a lack of domestic consensus.

Citing stories about Oslo and terrorism, Wolfsfeld said Israel's media are driven by a need "to turn events into a soap opera."

Israeli journalists value a good story or a scoop over the country's well-being, he said.

In his view, the 1993 political breakthroughs in Oslo stemmed, in part, from the fact the talks were secret.

"The media was kept away, and real negotiations could take place. The presence of reporters and cameras makes a peace process more difficult."

Israel's news media are highly influential in shaping public opinion, he said.

For years, the media supported Israel's occupation of southern Lebanon as a security necessity.

But after a late 1990s helicopter crash that killed scores of Israeli soldiers being flown to Lebanon, the media suddenly had second thoughts, said Wolfsfeld, who immigrated to Israel from the United States some 30 years ago.

In the wake of the accident, a blizzard of stories about the human costs of the occupation appeared. As a result, the consensus about Lebanon was irretrievably shattered.

And so the media, he theorized, probably accelerated Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon in May 2000.

Wolfsfeld said the media cast doubt on the ill-fated 2000 Camp David summit by publishing and broadcasting news of prospective Israeli concessions.

As a result, the major story coming out of Camp David was "the price of peace" – the sweeping concessions Israel would have to make to reach an agreement with the Palestinians.

"You only heard about the costs, not the possible benefits."

Drawing generic conclusions from his research, Wolfsfeld pointed to the "inherent contradiction" between the needs of the media and of peace.

"Selling newspapers depends on [the existence] of conflict, not peace," he observed, allowing for the possibility of exceptions to the rule.

The "media" and "peace" are strange bedfellows, he said. War is "an easier product" to convert into a news story. Violence and crises are newsworthy, while calm and co-operation are not.

The news media have a limited range, Wolfsfeld said: They can deal with events but not processes; specific actions but not long-term policies; opinions but not ideology; images but not text; major personalties but not institutions; two-sided disputes but not multi-sided conflicts; extremism but not moderation; dangers but not opportunities; and major breakthroughs but not incremental progress.

In short, the news media, which he said have become "another form of entertainment," promote war but not peace.

"How I relaxed away 33 pounds!"

Hello, I'm Edel Sykora from Brampton. I'm a hairstylist. This is my true story: How I relaxed away 33 pounds! And how my dress size dropped from a 12 to a sleek 6 in just six months! It couldn't have been easier.

BEFORE

I had been overweight since my divorce ten years ago. I knew diets weren't for me. I'd seen too many of my friends try and fail with dieting. I tried many different exercise routines. The problem was, my eating was out of control. I couldn't resist the junk foods and snacks.

A few years ago, I saw a television special about people who had lost weight and improved their lives with hypnosis. Then I saw Positive Changes Hypnosis in our local newspaper. I was impressed with their results, and wanted to learn more. I called to make my appointment for a free weight loss consultation.

Instant Results! Hypnosis gave me instant results! Within three days of my first session, I was no longer hungry. I melted off at least six pounds my first week! I waited three months to actually get on the scale. Imagine my astonishment when I had lost 33 pounds!

Before hypnosis, there were certain junk foods I couldn't resist. Hypnosis eliminated my cravings for those foods the very first week. I've had no ice cream and haven't missed it — not even once!

AFTER

I'm satisfied with less food and never feel deprived.

A 10+ Program! I recommend the Positive Changes Hypnosis program to everyone. Positive Changes is the best investment you can make in your future — and it's surprisingly inexpensive!

On a scale of 1 to 10, I give Positive Changes Hypnosis a 10+! I give them so much credit for my success. The staff has a great attitude and is well educated. They are dedicated to helping people and believe in their program 100%.

I have kept my weight off for a year and a half without even thinking about it! Weight problem? What weight problem?

Saddam's smarmy mouthpiece

Tariq Aziz, Iraq's smarmy deputy foreign minister, got his comeuppance in Rome recently. In the course of a press conference, during which he took any and all questions, an Israeli correspondent stood up and asked whether Iraq intended to attack Israel in the event of a war. Flummoxed by the journalist's identity, Aziz replied testily: "When I came to this press conference, it was not in my agenda to answer questions by the Israeli media. Sorry."

Evidently, Aziz – the official who masquerades as the kinder, gentler face of Saddam Hussein's brutal Stalinist regime – forgot he was not at home in Baghdad. If he had been as smart as his minions tell him he is, Aziz would have simply answered the Israeli reporter's important question and left it at that. But Aziz being Aziz, he could not resist the temptation to insult the reporter.

As the representative of a country that is ardently and openly committed to Israel's demise and holds the dubious record of having been the only Arab nation that refused to sign the 1949 Rhodes armistice agreements ending the first Arab-Israeli war, Aziz probably thought he could get away with snubbing the Israeli reporter. Instead, his boorish and contemptible behaviour was greeted by boos and hisses from some journalists and, better still, the mayor of Rome, Walter Veltroni, cancelled a scheduled meeting with Aziz.

"Rome, Mr. Deputy Prime Minister, has always had absolute respect for dialogue and the civil exchange of ideas, not to mention, obviously, freedom of opinion and free access to information," the mayor said. "I cannot accept that a public figure like yourself… can set a veto and discriminate against someone, denying them the right to express themselves, no matter what position they may represent."

The rebuke was in order. So deep is his animosity for Israel, and so inured is he to dictatorship, that Aziz could not bring himself to behave properly. Despite his exposure to Western values, Aziz still acts as if he had never left Iraq – a country that tortures and murders dissidents, gasses Kurds, starves its population while Saddamite palaces are built, invades its neighbours and fires missiles at them, harbours dangerous regional ambitions and continues to conceal weapons of mass destruction that could wreak havoc on the Middle East if Iraq is not fully and verifiably disarmed.

Being Saddam's faithful and smilingly cynical mouthpiece, Aziz's function is to lull naifs into swallowing the brazen lie that the Ba'athist regime in Baghdad has no weapons of mass destruction and is, in fact, co-operating with United Nations weapons inspectors. The reverse is, in fact, true. The Iraqi crisis could be resolved within a week if Iraq, as chief UN biological and chemical weapons inspector Hans Blix recently put it, exhibited "immediate, active and unconditional co-operation." But Iraq is stalling and dissembling, yet again, and so the countdown to war has begun.

Supports anti-war protests

Your editorial ("Contradictions, inconsistencies, mockery," CJN, Feb. 13) contained specious arguments to justify a war against Iraq. I have attended and marched in two anti-war protests in Toronto since last November. I saw no banners sympathetic to Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein. I heard no speeches that characterized him as misunderstood.

We advocates of peace believe that:

• Saddam and Iraq are not an imminent threat to our safety or freedom, something that every reputable political analyst believes.

• If there is a war, thousands of innocent Iraqi men, women and children will be killed by the might of the West's armaments. It is extremely unlikely that Saddam will be one of those victims.

• No nation has the right to attack another nation to force a regime change. Since we haven't attacked China or even stopped trading with it because of its vicious abuse of the people of Tibet, and its own people, for that matter, how do we rationalize this call to arms? And what can we say about American diplomacy toward North Korea, which we now realize possesses the nuclear capability to attack North America, something that might rightly be termed an imminent threat?

• Given that today's terror and instability are due to Al Qaeda, there is no doubt that even if Saddam is removed, the risk of terrorist attacks will not diminish. So while the cost of oil will probably come down, just as it will when the weather warms up or the crisis in Venezuela is resolved, our fears will continue unabated. Many people will still consider flying or even congregating in public areas an unreasonable risk.

If the United States and its supporters are genuine in their concern for the Iraqi people's plight at the hands of Saddam, how can those countries so readily agree to wage war on these same tortured people?

Protesters are 'dupes'

Former Soviet leader Josef Stalin would have had a phrase for the protesters in New York and Washington. He would have called them useful dupes.

When the Gulf War was fought in 1991, there were also huge protests in American cities. Back then, there were also dupes who carried signs and banners, waved to TV cameras, had run-ins with the cops and had great fun. Some things never change.

As soon as the war ended, so did the criticism. Suddenly, all those marchers and placard-holders lost their voice. And as soon as this war ends, all the protesters will develop a case of amnesia.

Essentially, the protesters in these disgraceful protests are suggesting that the Arabs who are under Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein's tyrannic rule should stay there. Their message is: don't liberate Iraq and, anyway, even if it is liberated, it would be a futile gesture as the Arabs don't deserve freedom. Arabs don't mind being brutalized, tortured, intimidated, gassed and shot by a fascist monster like Saddam. In the Middle East, it is the natural order of things and it is no one's business what happens to them.

Montreal's Iraqi population is one of the largest outside Iraq. If you were to ask them their opinion, most would say they are waiting eagerly for the day the United States liberates their country.

When Saddam is defeated, which will be very soon after the war begins, a new reality will emerge. All decent folk who support the war will have to apologize to the freed Iraqi people for the protesters' behaviour. We'll have to explain that they didn't mean any harm.

Book review offends

I believe the haredi community was viciously attacked in Bernard Baskin's review of the book, What Shall I Do With These People? ("Are We Tearing Ourselves Apart?" CJN, Feb 13). When a review of this book is published, it lends credibility to the author's misleading and blatantly anti-religious ideas. My husband and I are not religious Jews, but we have a deep love for people who adhere to the Torah. It is sickening that Jews would write about the holiest people in such a way.

The lost tribes of Israel

There were several mistakes in the article on my recent talk about the lost tribes of Israel and some things were taken out of context ("Tribes of Israel were not lost, says academic," CJN, Feb. 6).

First, the fall of the Northern Kingdom of Israel did not occur in 736 BCE, but 721 BCE.

Second, the article quotes me as saying, "We have no idea where they went on one level, and a perfectly good idea on another," and goes on to report that I believe we cannot say, geographically, where the Israelites went. This is not true. 2 Kings (17:6) tells us exactly where they went: Halah (a city in Assyria proper, in modern Iraq), settlements along the Habur river in the Assyrian province of Gozan (central Syria) and the "cities of the Medes," which corresponds to northern Iran. Indeed, Persian Jews may be able to trace their origins to the Assyrian exile because of this biblical passage and other archeological and literary records, and this may extend to the Bukharan and Afghan Jewish communities as well.

As for having "no idea on another level" as to where the tribes went, this is only because we can't really trace absolute tribal affiliation after a certain time period. The names of tribes are eventually only used to describe regions; that is, an Israelite could come from the "region of Naphtali" (2 Kings, 15:29), but that did not mean he or she was from the tribe of Naphtali. This is the case in Judah as well, which incorporated many different tribes, clans and other social groups. They were "Judeans" because of where they lived rather than because of who their ancestors may have been.

Finally, while the article properly paraphrases my contention that many of the "lost tribes" never lost touch with the Judeans and that a number likely fled into Judah during the Assyrian crisis, there is no doubt that many more were lost. The Assyrians made it very easy for a population to assimilate once it was deported from its homeland. This created a major shift in the way the deported Israelites saw themselves and the way the Judeans saw them as well, and a rift developed that led to their disappearance from Jewish consciousness and history.

Israelis in Canada today: the census picture

By LEO DAVIDS

Those of us who are used to hearing a lot of Hebrew when we go to a kosher bakery or other Jewish gathering spot often believe that there are vast numbers of former Israelis living among us in Canada. Estimates of their number vary greatly. Now that specific figures from the 2001 Census of Canada have been released by Statistics Canada, we can determine with considerable accuracy the size and locations of the Israeli community in Canada today.

Based on the new census results, we know that the Israeli community is concentrated in the Greater Toronto Area, which has almost 60 per cent of the Canadian residents who were born in Israel.

Before we look at some of the numbers, we define the term Israeli.

Who is an Israeli? Not everyone born in the Jewish state would fit into our usual conception of Israeli. After all, the country has at least a million Arab citizens, and some of them have immigrated to Canada.

Nevertheless, the language data we turn to below suggests that the vast majority of immigrants to Canada from Israel are Jewish. Perhaps, you will say, the best evidence is having Hebrew as one's first childhood language, which Statistics Canada refers to as "mother tongue." Many children born in Israel hear languages other than Hebrew at home – Yiddish, English, French or a host of other languages. So mother tongue is not an infallible marker of "Israeliness" either, although it probably works pretty well most of the time.

What is counted by the census that could help us find Israelis in Canada? There is a question on ethnic origin. Looking at that data, we find that the number of census respondents who report themselves as Israeli by ethnic origin is fairly small, actually fewer than half of those identified as Israeli by Hebrew mother tongue or by birth. Therefore, the ethnic origin criterion does not seem to offer a dependable way of locating Israelis in Canada. We will look at the specific numbers a little later on.

Considering that every personal or social identity has subjective as well as objective components, we should remember that census data cannot, no matter how abundant and accurate, tell the "whole story" for everyone. Does a Jewish immigrant to Israel become a "real Israeli" in a year's residence there, or after 25 years? If you've been in Canada for decades, are you still "an Israeli" forever because you were born there? In addition to the passage of time, other elements can play a part here, such as having (and using) a distinctive modern Hebrew name, or being fluent in conversational Hebrew (Ivrit), or just having mostly Israeli friends. Such factors are beyond our reach in this statistics-based analysis, but we should not forget that such hard-to-measure variables may be important for this topic.

Let us now turn our attention to the actual census figures, most of which can also be seen in the data table. The total of Israel-born Canadians in 2001 was 16,000. More than 9,400 of these live in the Greater Toronto Area, constituting about 59 per cent of the Israel-born total; almost 3,600 are Montreal residents, making up over 22 per cent of the Israeli born; and there are much smaller clusters in Vancouver, Calgary and other cities as well. We do not yet have the appropriate data to specify how many of these people are Jewish compared to other ethnic or religious groups, but I would estimate (based on the mother tongue numbers) that the majority of Canada's Israeli-by-birth population are Jews.

Next, let us examine the available information concerning mother tongue. For 2001, we find almost 12,500 people reporting that their sole mother tongue was Hebrew. That is a pretty good indication of being Israeli! In addition, just over 1,000 people had Hebrew and some other language as their first childhood tongues, bringing the total Hebrew mother tongue population for Canada in 2001 to 13,465. That is the sum of the single response (Hebrew only) and multiple response (Hebrew also) cases just referred to. Again, 59 per cent of the single response Hebrew mother tongue group live in Greater Toronto, with smaller counts in Montreal (24 per cent) and other Canadian cities. Judging by this language criterion, then, the total "Israeli community" in Canada is certainly larger than 13,000, if we include former Israelis whose first language may have been Yiddish or another language, as well as non-Israeli spouses and children of Israeli parents.

Trying to find Israelis by using the ethnic origin question turns out not to work very well. Only 1,400 census respondents across Canada in 2001 reported their ethnic origin as just/solely "Israeli." A considerably larger number indicated that their ethnic origin was Israeli along with other groups, often Israeli and Jewish. Adding the ethnic Israeli totals – that is those who reported only Israeli ethnicity as well as those who are Israeli and something else – we reach a Canadian total of 6,060, just 38 per cent as large as the born-in-Israel count, or 49 per cent of the single response Hebrew mother tongue group. Obviously, if someone decided to depend on the ethnic origin question to discover who is an Israeli in Canada, he or she would miss a great many candidates, judging by the other ways of finding this particular sector of the immigrant population.

> The Israeli community is concentrated in the Greater Toronto Area

Before coming to any conclusion about how many Israelis there are and where they are in Canada, let us look at the times when, according to the census immigration from Israel to Canada occurred. Of the 16,000 grand total, just over 3,000 arrived in Canada prior to 1971; during the 1970s and 1980s, almost 8,000 additional people came here from Israel.

This does not include immigrants who may have been born in another country, spent many important years in Israel (which may have included all of their education, perhaps some years of army duty) and then moved to Canada. The numbers do not include these cases because the immigrants were born outside Israel, but they may be counted in terms of Hebrew language or ethnic origin, if they report that way on the Canadian census.

Since 1991, about 5,000 Israeli-born immigrants reached Canada. During the past few years, more than 500 Israeli-born immigrants have come to Canada annually, of whom a few are not Jews. One may speculate to what degree Israelis are motivated by the ongoing Mideast conflict and political/terrorism crises, which no doubt play a significant role in the decision to leave for a safe and stable country such as Canada.

Within Canada, Toronto is the great magnet for immigrants, and Israelis are no exception. Between 1996 and 2001, almost 500 additional born-in-Israel residents show up in the Greater Toronto population. Greater Vancouver also gained 180 Israelis in this five-year interval. Montreal, however, had 280 fewer Israel-born residents in 2001 than were recorded in 1996, so that city is less popular among this group.

What conclusions would we reach, in light of the census information we have surveyed thus far? The largest category with regard to the Israeli population of Canada is based on place of birth, where we found a total of 16,000 people, about whom we do not yet know their religious affiliation (those data are not available before mid-May). Assuming that at least 85 to 90 per cent of these Israeli born immigrants are Jews, in view of the fact that almost 13,500 of them reported Hebrew mother tongue, we can then estimate the total Israeli community using reasonable guesses concerning spouses and children. While many Israelis in Canada are married to fellow Israelis, some have married people of other backgrounds, who are considered part of the Israeli community. The same broader definition of Israeliness would include Hebrew-speaking children who were born in Canada but have distinctive Hebrew names and sometimes wear clothing, jewelry, T-shirts or sports caps that connect them with the culture or people of Israel.

The overall Israeli community, then, should number about 25,00 to 30,000 people across Canada, including spouses and children who were not born in Israel but are seen as part of this group. We have also seen that using the ethnic origin question as an indicator of being part of this community is not practical, since so few of the immigrants from Israel identify themselves as Israeli rather than Jewish.

I am writing this column in California on Martin Luther King Day which, for some years, has been declared an official holiday in the United States. While nowadays much is known about the honoree, I was privileged to receive special information from my friend, Janice Rothschild Blumberg, who knew him and his family personally in Atlanta.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Rothschild Blumberg is the widow of my schoolmate Rabbi Jacob M. Rothschild and is herself a distinguished author of the Jewish history of the American South.

Here is what she told me:

"I saw Dr. King first as just another human being, a remarkable one to be sure, but not yet a legend. He was a colleague of my husband in the Atlanta ministry, married to a beautiful and talented young woman, the father of four small children and the son of a prominent and much beloved minister and his equally beloved wife.

"In those days, the name Martin Luther King referred to 'Daddy,' and one would have to add 'Jr.' to designate the civil rights leader – but there was no doubt among those exposed to the son's writing or preaching as to where future greatness would lie.

"His brilliance of mind, superb oratorical capacity and extraordinary courage were astonishing to all of us who knew him. I saw him also with his children, driving the carpool, while his wife, Coretta, entertained the wives of colleagues for lunch in their modest, middle class home. To us, Martin was both an icon and warm human being."

I, too, have personal memories of King. Some years ago, when I was senior rabbi of Holy Blossom Temple, my wife and I were privileged to have him for dinner at our home.

Elizabeth and I were keenly aware that our guest was about to become a historic figure, yet he was utterly modest and easy to speak to. After dinner, we all went to services at the temple, where he preached to the largest congregation the synagogue could accommodate. In addition, another thousand people stood outside and listened to him through a series of loudspeakers.

I still remember his speech, which focussed on "militancy without violence," a title that that perfectly expressed the essence of his highly successful social strategy.

Today, King's place in history is secure, though his dream of racial equality that he shared with the world still needs to be transformed into everyday reality.

Valentine's Day and the joys of being single

While I am pleased to report that Valentine's Day has come and gone, the bad news is that the pressure is still on.

Example: a recent conversation my mom had with my great-aunt, in which my aunt's breathless wishes of peace, happiness and health for the new year ended with a cryptic, "And may this new year also have a wedding in the cards!"

It's the kind of good wish that could just as easily sound like a threat.

"I wasn't sure who she thought the bride was going to be," my mother, who is also single, said dryly.

Like most single people, I resent anything that suggests I am not entirely complete because I am not in a steady relationship – and Valentine's Day is one of those things.

For a 15-year-old in the throes of a three-week relationship, who could never receive enough gaudy pink ruffled teddy bears that squawk "I LOVE YOU" when that magic button is pressed, Valentine's Day is just great.

I dare say I might have even gone so far as to circle that date on my calendar when I was 15.

But now the absurdity of celebrating a holiday just because Hallmark says we should seems ludicrous.

For those of us who are single on Valentine's Day, it's just another day of the week.

It means you roll out of bed and into the least sultry clothing imaginable and try to remember to comb your hair before you run out the door on your way to your first class.

It means navigating the hallway with expert skill – through the googly-eyed first year students who clutch their long-stemmed roses with incredulous glee and confused-looking messengers trying to find the recipients of floral arrangements.

Barbara Balfour in Calgary

It means feeling a shudder crawl down your spine every time one of those monstrosities they call Valentine's Day displays hits the corner of your eye. (Yet, you turn to look in the same way you would gawk at a bad traffic accident, not wanting to believe it's true – but it is.)

It's been an interesting and entertaining experience not being a part of all that.

But what's been even more entertaining is navigating the world of casual dating in Calgary's tiny Jewish community, an experience that more often than not resembles the series of vignettes from the beginning of the movie Kissing Jessica Stein.

There was the neurotic, uptight corporate banker who had a crippling phobia of germs and a bevy of preconceived notions about what 22-year-old women like or want.

There was the guy who was slightly aloof yet overly intense at the same time – yes, apparently this combination really is possible – who freely admitted to me that his biggest dream was to date Britney Spears.

There was the tango dancer who operated on Latin American time which, make no mistake, is distinctly different from Canadian time.

And there was the charming boy whose attractiveness was inversely proportional to the amount of alcohol that passed his lips, or worse yet, the things that came out of his mouth afterward.

Yes, there is a distinct joy in being single.

There is a definite feeling of freedom to be found in the fact I don't plan on subscribing to any bridal magazines any time soon – and that come graduation time in April, with no furniture to my name, and no liabilities or obligations, I could buy a one-way ticket to anywhere in the world.

This month, I took the plunge and bought the most expensive thing I have ever purchased (aside from my university tuition): A trip to Mexico with one of my girlfriends. And as I type this from our resort in Puerto Vallarta, I am elated that I can appreciate this experience not from the point of view of being half of a couple, but rather from the perspective of being entirely whole.

And yet, as my favourite actress Drew Barrymore says, "The best part of being single is that you never know if love could be just around the corner."

But I'm not on that quest to find my better half. Right now, I'm simply open to viewing yet another facet of the prism that is me.

Jewish student activists need a genuine partnership

Jewish student activism is one of those things that can be both unimaginably rewarding and frustratingly disconcerting. I can personally say that I often spend more time dealing with the Jewish Students' Association in Halifax than I do on my schoolwork. As with any community service, to really engage and spend the time, you absolutely must love what you are doing.

Joanna Grossman in Halifax

It's interesting to observe how the larger Jewish community has recently started to pay closer attention to what's happening on campuses.

With all of the politics, from the Concordia riots to the Daniel Pipes controversy at York, it's easy to see why campuses have become hot spots. People are acknowledging that universities are where movements begin. Ideas – whether supported by fact and evidence or not – proliferate on campuses, and from there, theories emerge that often have a great impact on the wider "real world." The 1960s-reared baby-boomer generation, who now hold leadership roles in our communities, are watching their own children face campus environments wracked with controversy.

The buzzwords for Jewish students on campus these days are "Israel advocacy." The adults who provide us with resources see the challenge we are confronting, and, as human nature dictates, want to see immediate results from those who represent them on campus.

In Halifax, we have benefited from a generous grant from UIA Federations Canada, which has allocated money for Israel advocacy campaigns on small campuses outside of major centres. We have the funds to implement the grandest of ideas, yet the issues of greatest concern remain unconsidered.

It is so easy to recognize a problem and demand a solution. But while one problem is being addressed with dollars and cents, those in the trenches realize they don't have the tools to deal with greater challenges.

Unfortunately, we live in a world where money often appears to be the bottom line. Let me say that I appreciate the Jewish community's generosity, and knowing that campuses are a priority for the community at large comes as an affirmation of the vast amount of work students do on a daily basis.

However, the struggles we face on campus are often subordinated to the broader issues that admittedly pose a real threat to the future of Jewish life, whether on campus or in the real world we will face after graduation.

Despite the work we do, and the roles we play to strengthen the communities that support us, we have yet to find a true voice for ourselves. We don't have the means to earn a proper seat at the table. We are given the resources to fix problems that are defined by those who work above us.

But the equation falls apart because core problems aren't being addressed.

We are working in a system that has yet to recognize that for students to be actively engaged, they must develop stronger roots in the community that seeks their participation.

Many students want to divorce themselves from the lifestyle that dominated their upbringing. And many see their Jewish connection as a burden and something to run away from. That is the most profound Jewish problem on campuses today.

But even for those students who want to be actively involved in Jewish life, it's often not easy.

Students cannot be asked sporadically what they think or be treated like a group of dependants. If any sort of comprehensive attempt at reviving a sense of Jewish pride among the next generation of leaders is to be made, it must come from students themselves under the guidance of a community that has taken the time and energy to listen to the ideas and struggles of its youth.

But more importantly, the community needs to recognize that students must be treated with equality, as partners in a shared future. Their successes cannot be belittled and their accomplishments marginalized.

When the energies of active and involved students must be harnessed to deal with the community hierarchies in place for our supposed assistance instead of dealing with the real issues on campuses, it's no wonder that the Jewish campus community is so lacking in enthusiasm and drive.

The Kirshner File

Palestinians debate the efficacy of violence

Last June, shortly after 26 civilians and soldiers were killed in back-to-back suicide bombings in Jerusalem, Palestinian leaders issued an unprecedented manifesto calling for an end to suicide attacks.

"We appeal to those who stand behind military operations to rethink and reconsider these actions and stop pushing young men to carry out such attacks that target civilians in Israel. We don't see any benefits out of such attacks except widening the gap of hatred between the two peoples."

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The statement – signed by personalities ranging from Sari Nusseibeh, the president of Al Quds University, to Hanan Ashrawi, a former Palestinian Authority official – touched off a spirited public debate. It turns on the efficacy of violence as a means to achieve key political objectives, from ending Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip to attaining statehood.

Ephraim Halevy, chair of Israel's National Security Council and the former chief of the Mossad, believes the debate stems from a well-founded fear that failure to condemn terrorism will imperil the gains of the Palestinian national movement.

Mindful of this danger, a number of prominent Palestinians have followed Nusseibeh's lead.

Prior to being sidelined as interior minister by PA President Yasser Arafat, Abdel Razak Yehiyeh issued a scathing denunciation of suicide bombings, describing them as "a mistake from both a moral and a tactical point of view" and declaring his opposition to "any kind of armed struggle."

In the wake of this stinging rebuke, Mahmoud Abbas (Abu Mazen), Arafat's deputy and an architect of the now-defunct Oslo peace process, told Arafat's Fatah movement that the ongoing Palestinian uprising is ill-conceived and should be stopped.

Taking up his argument, Muhammed Rashid, Arafat's economic advisor and one of the few Palestinian leaders Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has met, called for a halt to armed attacks and a ceasefire. In effect, he advised Palestinians to mount a non-violent campaign of civil disobedience.

Judging by the bleak situation on the ground, their appeals have largely fallen on deaf ears. The current intifadah, which erupted in September 2000, is still brewing and sometimes even boiling over.

Last week, Israel's police commissioner, Shlomo Aharonishky, released the grim statistics. In 2002, Palestinian terrorists killed 456 people – Jewish and Arab residents of Israel, as well as overseas visitors and foreign workers – and wounded 2,300, some maimed for life. In the previous year, terrorism claimed the lives of 261 and wounded 1,525.

The new year began inauspiciously with a suicide attack in Tel Aviv that killed 23 Israelis and foreigners. The Jan. 5 incident in Tel Aviv was the second most devastating attack visited upon Israel since the start of suicide bombings in the spring of 1994, next to the March 27, 2002 bombing in Netanya that killed 29 people during a Passover seder.

Although some members of the Palestinian elite condemn suicide bombings and decry violence, their calls for moderation have been fiercely resisted by Palestinians who insist that any Israeli, civilian or soldier, is a legitimate target.

On this extreme side of the spectrum are organizations such as Hamas, which took responsibility for the destruction of an Israeli tank with four crewmen in Gaza two weeks ago; Islamic Jihad, which has carried out a series of deadly attacks in the past nine years; and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, which claimed credit for the Jan. 5 bombing.

Two months ago, Islamic Jihad, the Democratic Front for the Liberation of Palestine and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine vowed to continue attacking Israel and lashed out at moderate Palestinians. Within a month of that pronouncement, 10 Damascus-based radical Palestinian groups released a similar communique.

Their spokesperson, Farouk Kaddoumi, an opponent of the Oslo accords, said, "Resistance and uprising are our choice so long as serious political negotiations [with Israel] are not in hand." Warming to this theme, Marwan Barghouti, an imprisoned Fatah leader, subsequently observed, "Resistance is a holy right for the Palestinian people to face the Israeli occupation."

The PA leadership, from Arafat on down, hews to a contradictory position on violence. It has urged Palestinians to cease "all military attacks, particularly against Israeli civilians," but it clearly condones attacks on Israelis in the West Bank and Gaza, the bedrock of a future independent Palestinian state.

Of late, Arafat himself has come out against some forms of violence – notwithstanding Israel's assertion that he encourages, directs and funds terrorism and that his critique of terrorism is disingenuous.

On Dec. 31, Arafat reiterated his opposition to "all acts of violence," but stopped short of recommending a halt to attacks in the West Bank and Gaza. Insisting he wants peace, he repeated his claim that Palestinians are ready to live in a sovereign state alongside Israel.

On Feb. 2, Arafat called on Israel to negotiate a truce, and in a leaflet dated Feb. 5, he urged Palestinians in Gaza to turn in Palestinians who fire Qassem rockets and mortars at settlements inside Israel. The leaflet warned that the rocket fire is counterproductive to the Palestinian cause.

Sharon rejected Arafat's call "to resume negotiations without delay," claiming he was not a suitable partner. But on Feb. 8, after meeting with Ahmed Qureia (Abu Ala), the speaker of the Palestinian legislature, Sharon disclosed that Israel had offered to redeploy its army and ease restrictions on Palestinians in areas where Palestinian security forces succeed in preventing terrorism or make a serious effort to do so.

There have been several major attempts to hammer out a lasting ceasefire over the past 2½ years, the most recent one having been launched last August in Bethlehem and Gaza at the initiative of Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, Israel's then defence minister. But each truce, so far, has failed miserably.

Sari Nusseibeh

Egypt, succumbing to U.S. pressure to try to ease tensions in the West Bank and Gaza on the eve of an expected war in Iraq, has attempted to convince a dozen rival Palestinian groups to accept a ceasefire. The talks, directed by Egypt's head of intelligence, Gen. Omar Suleiman, have been held in Cairo. Suleiman's primary goal is to halt attacks against civilians in Israel. Like the Palestinians, Egypt draws a distinction between attacks inside Israel and those against Israeli soldiers and settlers in the territories.

The on-again, off-again talks, which are scheduled to resume this week, have broken down several times over the last few months.

Groups such as the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade and the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine condition their acceptance of a truce on Israel's withdrawal to the pre-intifadah lines and its disavowal of its policy of targeted killings. Hamas and Islamic Jihad, which openly reject Israel's very existence, have signalled an interest in a temporary truce, provided Israel returns to its pre-1967 border and accepts a Palestinian right of return.

Since Israel has no intention of acquiescing to these conditions, there is realistically no reason to assume that Suleiman can cobble together a workable ceasefire.

Suleiman is also struggling against the currents of Palestinian public opinion.

The Palestinian Center for Policy and Research has found that the majority of Palestinians are in favour of attacking Israeli civilians and soldiers in the territories.

According to a Hebrew University poll, 53 per cent support attacks in Israel, while 90 per cent back attacks in the territories.

The JMCC polling company discovered that 63 per cent believe that suicide bombings should continue.

Still other surveys detect a silver lining.

According to Search for Common Ground, the world's largest conflict prevention and resolution non-governmental organization, 72 per cent of Palestinians are prepared to move beyond the cycle of violence if a Palestinian state based in the West Bank and Gaza is established. Respondents, however, expressed a lack of faith in Israel's willingness to make the necessary concessions.

Sharon, who railed against Oslo, is opposed to ceding the bulk of the territories to accommodate a viable Palestinian state. In fact, he has offered the Palestinians about 42 per cent of the West Bank, far less than his Labor party predecessor, Ehud Barak.

Just as significantly, Sharon has made it crystal clear that he will not negotiate with the Palestinians under fire. In this, he is supported by Chief of Staff Gen. Moshe Ya'alon and Defence Minister Shaul Mofaz, who claim that such negotiations would only encourage further attacks.

But Sharon's refusal to negotiate under fire gives Palestinian rejectionist groups veto power over the peace process.

Reading Buddies

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto

We believe that a love of reading is vital to a child's success in school. The highlight of our school week is Reading Buddies, when children from Grade 2 to 5 are partnered with children from Nursery to Grade 1 for an hour of reading, story writing, and crafts. Imagine the pride of a child in Grade 2 who is finally old enough to read to a child in Nursery! These relationships build throughout the year and extend beyond the classroom, helping us shape our school as a warm, family environment where children care for and enrich each other.

More windows on the past

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Toward the end of the 19th century, as Jewish multitudes left the Old World for the promising shores of the New, the Toronto neighbourhood of St. John's Ward became a densely populated Jewish ghetto.

In 1881, Toronto's population was 86,415, according to the census of that year, with an average of 19 persons per acre. On Elizabeth, Chestnut, Centre and other streets of the Ward, however, the density was 41 persons per acre, more than twice the city average.

Impoverished Irish, Italian and other immigrants also lived on these streets. The houses were small and shanty-like, and most lacked running water. Residents depended on wells, cisterns and backyard privies. Empty lots became garbage dumps. Poverty, hunger and illness were rampant.

One of many concerned charitable associations, the Hope Street Soup Kitchen was feeding upward of 700 people daily in the spring of 1884. The local House of Industry took in thousands of destitute souls each year, and also gave out bread, coal and soap to many families, and it distributed tea, sugar, oatmeal and rice to the sick.

Having seen a footnote reference that described the House of Industry's detailed ledger books as a sort of "manuscript census," I visited the Toronto City Archives, keen on inspecting this potentially useful genealogical source.

Beginning in 1875 and continuing for more than 40 years, House of Industry admissions were recorded by hand in two huge volumes. The following entry is typical: "Adelaide Allen. Aged 40. Deserted 12 years by husband John Allen who is an inmate of this house... 4 children – 3 sons and daughter. Children are away in the United States and Canada..."

Many entries actually name the children and give cities of residence. For better or for worse, however, Jews rarely crossed the institution's doorstep. Generally speaking, though, such unique archival sources may offer valuable complementary information to the censuses of 1901 and earlier.

City directories also provide a good glimpse into the house-by-house composition of the Ward of a century ago. The following sample listing of one block of Chestnut Street (house numbers in brackets) in 1899 clearly demonstrates its pervasive Jewish character:

Moses Bomensour, gro (59); Vacant (61); Joseph Bested (63); David Zipper (65); Julius Breslin (67); Israel Greisman (69); David Papernick (71); Jacob Besvinick, gro (73); Benjamin Rotkin (75); Mrs. Mary Barchard, Samuel Moore (77); Louis Rubin (79); Mrs. Mary Townley (81); Charles Grosser (83); Hyman Breslin (85); Jacob Cohen, tlr (87); Isaac Rabinowitch (89); Joseph Solway (91); Simon Glazier (93); Albert C. Jackson (95); Frances Townley (97); John Kelly (99); Charles Newman (101); Harry Topp (103); Charles Nalborough (105); and Charles Sharp (107). (Across a lane stood Mission Hall, which soon afterward became the Chestnut Street synagogue.)

Accessible through major libraries, city directories can be as valuable to the genealogist as census records, passenger manifests and citizenship records. For example, my mother's grandparents and dozens of their Rubinoff-Naftolin family cousins began leaving Belarus about 1905, and most settled in Toronto. City directories provide evidence as to the order in which they arrived and how they survived once they did.

Landing about 1905, my great-grandfather Meyer Feivel Naftolin is later shown living on Defoe St. (later Adelaide) and working as a tinsmith for Soren Brothers. The directory's business section contains a large advertisement for Soren Brothers, with an illustration of its modern, five-storey plant and a full description of its product line.

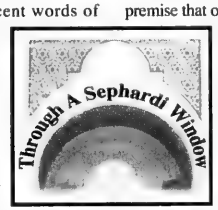
Canadian genealogists recently welcomed news that the government is preparing legislation to lift privacy restrictions around the post-1901 censuses. Until later censuses are released, city directories provide a useful alternate window on the past.

Thoughts on separating church, state in Israel

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Liyot am chofshi b'artzenu – to be a free nation in our own land.

In these few innocent words of the Israeli national anthem lies a great dilemma, as they mean different things to different folk.



Optimally, one would say that the words mean to be free, at last, in one's own country, Israel – free to pursue and to express one's religion openly and as desired.

For others, this said freedom is altogether different. As evidenced by the campaign slogans in the recent election of the Meretz and Shinui parties – "government without the haredim" – these words mean to free the country's government from the flavour of traditional Judaism. In short, if Israel is the democracy that it claims to be, let it be a full one, patterned after western democracies.

For us North Americans, religious freedom is pretty much a given. You could even say it's something we take for granted. The path to our religious freedom was paved with a simple premise that our country would clearly separate church and state. All citizens can enjoy freedom of religion no matter what their religion may be because the government is a secular institution. The nation has (officially, at least) no state religion. Hence, all its citizens are able to choose their own faith.

Certainly, this system works well for us in North America. It is not the concern of the government what our religion is, or how we practise it. Lifecycle events such as birth, marriage, divorce and burial are a matter of simple (bureaucratic) civil registration. All citizens must fulfil their legal civic duties. But after this is done, the way we deal with these events is wholly of our own choosing.

This is not the case in Israel. Citizens in the State of Israel must declare their faith and thereby light those perennial fires of who is a Jew. In protest, many secular Jews demand to be registered as Yisraeli rather then Yehudi. The institution of marriage and divorce is the domain of the Ministry of Religious Affairs, a fact that brings bitter resentment to many. Even in burial one is told where one may and may not be laid to rest.

State-sponsored religion does not promote religion, it only breeds antagonism against it. Would it be possible, then, to separate church and state in Israel as it is separated in the rest of the western world? Would it still be possible to maintain a semblance of Jewish character in the country? Can one not be a free citizen of Israel, where questions of religion and personal status remain in the hands of one's own clergy instead of that of the state? Would not the people of Israel benefit, as we do, by such a distinction, which would prevent the breeding of overt hatred between Jews? Would not this easing of hatred allow the secular a second glance and a second chance at their own religion?

Israel prepares for war

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Israelis remember the Gulf War of 1991, when they put on gas masks and huddled in "safe rooms" while Iraq fired Scud missiles at their country. As the world debates the Iraqi issue once again, Israelis once again prepare for the worst. Today, a look at the challenges Israelis are facing.

Israel's homefront command is the central body that prepares the country for possible conventional and non-conventional attacks. Its Web site shows photos of various kinds of gas masks, including ones designed for children. The mask for three- to eight-year-olds is brightly coloured and designed to reduce feelings of claustrophobia by allowing a wide field of vision. The infant version has a nipple built into the hood at mouth level to allow for feeding [http://www.idf.il/english/organization/homefront/index.stm].

Despite the calm that planning agencies are trying to project, the cover of the Hebrew version of the Municipality of Ra'anana's emergency instruction booklet is quite chilling. It shows a panorama of the city behind two people clad in biological protection suits. Inside, the booklet explains how to respond when a siren sounds and what to do during an attack [http://www.raanana.muni.il/htmlsEng/herumeng.html].

In "Non-conventional Warfare and Me," Sara Levinsky Rigler describes what it's like to attend an emergency information seminar in Jerusalem's Old City. What starts off as a room full of nervous laughter becomes deadly serious when a soldier outlines the threats posed by nerve gas, mustard gas and anthrax [http://www.aish.com/jewishissues/israeldiary/Non-conventional_Warfare_and_Me.asp].

Israel is taking no chances with Iraq – even if it claims it no longer has the means to attack Israel. As Prime Minister Ariel Sharon told Reuters, "I assess it [the current risk from Iraq] as a minor danger, but it exists and we have prepared the best possible solutions" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?R18312E73].

One of those solutions is Israel's $2.2 billion (US) Arrow missile defence system. The Arrows are expected to be much more effective than the American-made Patriots that failed to detonate any of the 39 incoming Scuds in 1991. But will the Arrow work? The Jerusalem Report answers that question in an in-depth analysis titled "Israel: Will the Arrow Find its Target?" [http://makeashorterlink.com/?S5F632673]. As for Israel's ability to retaliate, Israel Defence Forces (IDF) chief Moshe Ya'alon says the army is well-prepared [http://makeashorterlink.com/?H21915673].

One of Israel's fears is Iraq's ability to target the country with biological weapons such as smallpox. The Israeli government has decided not to inoculate its population except for a limited number of frontline rescue and medical personnel. The Ministry of Health has set up a site to answer questions about the disease, the reasons behind Israel's inoculation policy and its potential use in warfare [http://www.health.gov.il/smallpox/pox_eng/index.htm].

Tourists have been included in emergency plans. The Ministry of Tourism has distributed 10,000 protective kits to hotels and youth hostels across the country. All hotels in Israel have been supplied with videotapes that explain how to use the kits in Hebrew, English, Russian and Amharic. In the event of a non-conventional attack, medical treatment and immunization will be provided to tourists in affected areas [http://www.mfa.gov.il/mfa/go.asp?MFAH0mzv0].

As adults debate the gravity of the situation, how do they explain to their children why they are sealing off rooms in their homes? Clinical psychologist Dr. Batya Ludman has this advice for parents:

- Understand children's needs and concerns. Very young children may need little information except that they will be in a room with their parents. Older children worry more about their own safety and the safety of the adults important to them.
- Help children feel they are in control by asking what they think and giving them tasks.
- In order to look after their children, parents must look after themselves. "If you or your children are not coping well, get professional help to enable you to be less anxious."

Dr. Ludman says, "While there are no easy answers and these are only suggestions, enabling your child to feel comfortable and secure is one of the best gifts you can provide during these very difficult times" [http://www.israelnewsagency.com/israelchildrenwar.html].

Finding God in the garden

Finding God in the Garden: Backyard Reflections on Life, Love, and Compost*, Balfour Brickner, Little Brown and Company, 2002, $34.95.

Gardening is the closest one can come to being present at the act of creation. Poet William Blake said he saw heaven in a wild flower. A medieval Jewish scholar pointed out that the letters of the Hebrew words for God and hateva (nature) have the same numerical value. A modern poet has expressed a similar outlook: "The kiss of the rain for pardon, the song of the birds for mirth, one is nearer God's heart in a garden than anywhere else on earth."

Books
Bernard Baskin

The author of this slender volume has been a rabbi for 45 years and long associated with the Stephen Wise Free Synagogue in New York City. Making use of his beloved garden as a viewing lens, he discusses – briefly, and from a religiously liberal point of view – such questions as free will, miracles, religion and science, prayer and the nature of sex and love.

For the author, miracles are present in the orderly universe we inhabit and in our capacity to discern that order. He writes: "I believe in the miraculous beauty of the shrubbery and trees that surround my garden when the autumn turns their leaves to red and gold and flaming orange. I believe in the miracle of the human body, more complicated by far than the most ingenious piece of machinery invented by humans. And I believe in the miracles of medicine, which every day unravel those mysteries and enable us to cure, heal, and prolong life. I believe because I am a gardener."

He insists that God cannot be held responsible for the disasters that we create. God is self-limited, he says, a power that cannot grant human beings free will and then interfere every time we choose evil over good. "God does not do. God is. We do."

Does God hear our prayers? "I do not know," writes Rabbi Brickner. "No one does. Perhaps the real question ought to be, 'Do we hear our prayers, and do they make a difference in our behaviour?' Prayer may not be able to mend a broken bone or cure cancer, but it can soothe a broken heart and change a life. And it has. God does not need our prayers. We do."

When homosexuals seek him out, the author says, "They want to be with someone who can hear them say, 'I have not chosen my sexual orientation or lifestyle. This is not a matter of sexual preference. It has been for me a living hell. I no more chose my attachment to another of my own gender than you, rabbi, chose the love of a woman.' "

When Rabbi Brickner lost his 17-year-old daughter in a tragic accident, doctors told him that had she lived, she would have been a vegetable.

"Many times I have asked myself, 'Is that what you would have wanted for Elisa?' Had I been at the hospital and had the physicians or staff asked me, would I have said, 'Keep her alive at all costs?' As I look back over the years, I do not think I would have made such a decision. Elisa was too vital, too exuberant, too enamoured of life to have wanted merely to exist. I believe I would have said, 'Let God take her.' "

There are, of course, cogent counter-arguments to many of the author's non-traditional views. But they are unabashedly rational and heartfelt, and they will have appeal, especially to gardeners.

Masorti suffers lack of 'brand recognition'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Among the higher profile issues facing the Masorti movement in Israel is the lack of recognition of its marriages and conversions by Israel's Orthodox rabbinate. Accessing government funding and addressing recent funding cuts by the Jewish Agency is also a significant issue.

But the most central issue, according to a visiting scholar who was in Toronto recently, is "brand recognition."

Avinoam Sharon, a 47-year-old rabbinical student in his second year at the Schechter Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, is used to having Israelis confuse Masorti, as the Conservative movement is known in Israel, with Reform Judaism.

The problem, according to Sharon – who spoke to The CJN last week towards the end of a two-week stint as "rabbi-in-residence" at Beth Tzedec Congregation – is that Israelis who don't realize the Masorti movement is based on Halachah may reject it for the wrong reasons.

With increased recognition of the Masorti movement, Sharon feels solutions to the other issues will fall into place.

Some North American Conservative Jews – themselves not a homogeneous group – might also find aspects of the Masorti movement in Israel unfamiliar. "Masorti in Israel is far more traditional than the Conservative movement in North America in a variety of ways," said Sharon.

Avinoam Sharon

Although driving to synagogue has been permitted by the Conservative movement since the 1950s, Masorti's Halachah committee in Israel has ruled that driving is not permitted on Shabbat, said Sharon. Many Masorti men wear kippot and tzitzit full time, he added.

On the other hand, the movement in Israel is fully egalitarian. In North America, Conservative synagogues range from completely egalitarian to completely non-egalitarian. In the Toronto area, only one of the seven synagogues affiliated with the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism is fully egalitarian.

Masorti Judaism has been established in Israel for sever decades – there are now 55 congregations – but the averag Israeli is "not terribly aware" of it, said Sharon. Originally, was perceived as a foreign transplant because the founders Israel's first Masorti synagogues were primarily North America olim.

Sharon believes that that perception is changing, with a increasing number of Israeli-born Masorti rabbis, one of whon Ehud Bandel, is president of the movement in Israel. Rabb Bandel was also the first Sabra to be ordained as a Masor rabbi in 1988.

Although Sharon was born in the United States and spen most of his formative years there, the retired IDF lieutenant colonel and chief military prosecutor for Judea, Samaria an Gaza feels he too has earned the right to say he's "as Israeli a anyone."

A native of New York who moved to Israel at age 14 i 1970, Sharon took a circuitous path to rabbinical school. Alon the way he earned a bachelor's degree in linguistics and ancien Semitic languages at Columbia University and a law degre at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, where he met his wif Miriam Shatz, a native of Winnipeg who grew up in Calgary Her late father Harry was executive director of the Jewis Community Council of Calgary.

Sharon, a graduate of the Jerusalem Institute of Cantoria Art and Music who also has operatic training, has anothe Canadian connection. For the past 27 years, he has served a High Holy Day cantor at synagogues in Edmonton.

After retiring from the IDF, Sharon was looking for some thing that would give him the same feeling of purpose he had in the army, he said.

On his recent visit as Beth Tzedec's Tanenbaum Fellow Sharon's purpose was to learn as well as to teach.

"One of the things I've learned," he said, "is how a single congregation can take a pluralistic approach." Sharon cited the variety of Shabbat services as one example. "In Israel you'd have to go to five different synagogues [to get that variety]."

The idea of addressing the varied needs of congregants rather than the rabbi's idea of the "correct path" is novel to Israelis.

The concept reminds Sharon, a former chair of the Israeli Alpine club, of mountain climbing. "There can be hundreds of routes up a mountain. For some people it's all about the view. They want to be able to drive to the top. Others want to enjoy the time [along an easy walking path] with their family. For others, it's the challenge of a rock face ascent. You pick your route."

His personal path has been a "route of discovery," he said. Raised Conservative but educated in Orthodox schools, Sharon is "going down a route that to a certain extent is familiar." But, he added metaphorically, "when you watch a sunset, the same sunset as you saw yesterday, if you leave yourself open to it, you can still be inspired."

Conservative rabbis grapple with issue of women witnesses

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The subject of women as witnesses in Jewish law may sound esoteric, but it is potentially the most divisive issue in the Conservative movement and could affect people's Jewish status in the future, according to Rabbi Herbert Mandl.

The Kansas City, Kan. rabbi – a two-time president of the Conservative movement's Rabbinical Assembly who wrote his PhD thesis on testimony in Jewish law – discussed the issue recently along with Rabbi Susan Grossman of Columbia, Md. in a debate moderated by Rabbi Wayne Allen at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

The program was one of a series on the Changing Role of Women in Synagogue Ritual, co-sponsored by the synagogue's sisterhood and adult education committee.

Rabbi Grossman – who serves on the Conservative movement's Committee for Jewish Law and Standards and whose responsum in favour of women as witnesses in Jewish law was accepted as one of the official positions of the Conservative movement in 2001 – lamented the movement's reluctance to be "brave on one of these last great obstacles to integration of women in Jewish life for fear of creating status issues."

The majority of the Orthodox world doesn't accept Conservative documents in any case, she noted.

Rabbi Mandl, who has both Orthodox and Conservative smichah but is not otherwise affiliated with Orthodoxy, noted that there are different types of witnesses. A woman having the right to testify about occurrences in the women's area of the synagogue is different from a woman testifying as a witness to a divorce.

There are responsa from Israel that allow women to have a testimonial role, he said.

But the issue of women serving as witnesses, especially in Jewish divorces, is not just a theoretical issue, said Rabbi Mandl.

"If you're not married properly, who cares? We recognize common-law marriages. Conversion? You can go again. But when you're dealing with divorce, which is a one-way street, you're dealing with big issues. The concept that if the two parties are comfortable with it, it's cool – it's not, because if your kids become religiously observant or move to Israel, 30 years later you're going to say, 'Shouldn't have done that.'"

Rabbi Grossman agreed that the well-being of congregants is a legitimate concern, but to not use women as witnesses "because we might be creating mamzerim [the children of an adulterous relationship who, under Jewish law, are restricted in their choice of marriage partners] seems to me to be a specious argument."

There are ways to ameliorate that situation, she noted. In the past, the original Conservative marriage has been declared null and void under Orthodox auspices [to allow the subsequent marriage to be seen as non-adulterous], she added.

Women now have the characteristics it would take to be eligible as witnesses, said Rabbi Grossman, who has not served as a witness to a get, although she has on other documents. In our culture, she noted, women function as socially equal to men.

From a practical standpoint, she questions what happens "when you're in the boondocks" and there are not enough religiously committed men to serve as witnesses, but "the rabbi's wife" is available.

"I'm hoping that as history plays itself out, that more colleagues will feel more comfortable accepting women's signatures on documents."

Other Jewish laws have changed to reflect changes in society, noted Rabbi Grossman. As an example, Jewish law allows women to inherit although the Bible prohibits it except under limited circumstances.

Women have been serving as witnesses for almost 30 years, said Rabbi Grossman. In 1974, the Conservative movement's law committee voted by a "minority opinion" (six in favour, seven against) to approve the use of women as witnesses in all areas of Jewish law, she noted. Her more recent responsum was passed by a slim majority.

The Conservative movement is a pluralistic one, explained Rabbi Grossman, comparing the dichotomy to that of Hillel and Shammai on the ancient Sanhedrin.

That puts rabbis like Rabbi Mandl in a "very awkward situation," he said. Now that more Conservative rabbis are accepting women as witnesses, for the first time in his 32-year-career (which began in Edmonton and Montreal) he's faced with the possibility of telling people who want to be married that he does not accept their status even though other Conservative rabbis would.

Gala, fashion show to help fight breast cancer

The second annual Catwalk Cure Gala and Fashion Show will benefit the breast cancer program at Sunnybrook and Women's College Health Sciences Centre.

It will be held Feb. 27 at the York Event Theatre, 101 Eglinton Ave. E., at 7 p.m. The event is for gentlemen only, and will include dinner, silent and mystery auctions, and the fashion show. The money will be directed through The Judy Mantella Memorial Fund.

Mantella died of breast cancer, one of the more than 20,000 Canadian women diagnosed each year with the disease. She established the fund together with her husband and two sons "to help other mothers, wives, daughters and friends trimph over this disease," a media release says.

The pledge goals for this year's event have already been exceeded, the release saysd.

The entrance fee is $300. For more information or for tickets, call Susan Sansone, 416-880-2627, or visit the Web site, catwalkcure.com.

Women's rabbinic conference held in London

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Nancy Morris, the only Canadian at last month's biennial conference of the Women's Rabbinic Network in London, England, said it was a bonding experience to meet with female rabbis from around the world.

The WRN represents the 373 women rabbis in the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the umbrella organization of the Reform rabbinate and the world's largest group of Jewish clergy.

The conference, the first outside the United States, was held at the Liberal Jewish Synagogue. It attracted about 100 rabbis and rabbinical students from the United States, United Kingdom, Belarus, Canada, France, Holland, Hungary, Israel and Norway.

Rabbi Morris, spiritual leader of Temple Har Tikvah in Brampton, Ont., said it was fascinating to connect with "the whole world of women rabbis, and pray together in 10 different languages."

Among the issues they discussed, she said, is the changing role of rabbis.

"Until recent years, all rabbis were men with nuclear families. They lived in the community, and their wife was the rebbitzen.

"How many men would take on the role of rebbitzen, however, if their wife was the rabbi? Moreover, more women are immersed in their own careers. They have no time to be rebbitzen."

The nature of the rabbinate has also changed, she said. "A rabbi used to be the charismatic figure on a pedestal. He preached and people listened.

"Now, congregants want someone who is approachable, to whom they can talk. It's a tough role to play – to be one of them but to retain their respect as a religious leader.

"This is similar to what patients look for in a physician. A good bedside manner is as important as the medicine they prescribe. It is a universal issue."

Rabbi Judith Schindler, co-chair of WRN, said that women in Europe did have some different issues from women in North America.

"A European woman rabbi is often the only female rabbinic voice in her country. While

Rabbi Nancy Morris

American rabbis seek pay [on par with] their male colleagues, those in the United Kingdom have yet to break the glass ceiling.

"They have not yet been appointed senior rabbis of the largest congregations, nor are they completely accepted as equals.

"The one female rabbi in Hungary, Katalin Kelemen, who serves a vibrant liberal community, is not even recognized as legitimate by the institutions of the broader Jewish community."

Israeli colleagues, said Rabbi Schindler, feel positive about their impact as liberal women rabbis. "Their challenge at the moment is being rabbis in the face of war and daily crisis. Their tasks include escorting bereaved families to bury their loved ones."

Rabbis in Israel need to use their pastoral skills more than ever "as Israelis face the impact of a devastated economy and increased isolation.

"One rabbi in Israel said that the best thing about her job is that she lives in Jerusalem, and the hardest thing about her job is that she lives in Jerusalem," said Rabbi Schindler.

She said that "as women rabbis we share so much. We learned that together we have a powerful voice which we must use to speak out.

"We must support our colleagues in distant countries to attain equality, and to help women throughout the world who lack not only religious freedom, but other freedoms as well."

Halachic decisions too stringent, rabbi says

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Over the past century, halachic decision-making has gone from trying to make Jewish life easier, and being responsive to changing conditions and local situations, to an emphasis on being stringent and immutable, says Rabbi Daniel Sperber, a professor of Talmud at Bar-Ilan University.

In fact, poskim, those who make decisions on matters of religious law, across the Orthodox spectrum have acknowledged that certain things are perfectly acceptable, yet they are forbidden anyway, he said in a recent lecture at Beth Jacob V'Anshe Drildz congregation held under the auspices of Torah in Motion and Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University.

"This is not how poskim worked over the centuries," said Rabbi Sperber, a prolific scholar and author who received the Israel Prize in 1997.

Indeed, the poskim have come up with many innovations over the years, he said.

In mishnayic times (the 11th and 12th centuries), for instance, the scholar Hillel saw that because of biblical laws of shmittah, in which all loans are cancelled in the seventh year, people were not lending money.

This posed a tremendous hardship to the poor, Rabbi Sperber said. Hillel permitted the prosbul, a legal fiction that transferred the loan to the rabbinic court.

In the 16th century, the rabbi said, a ruling was made that permitted interest on loans, something also forbidden in the Torah, but which had become an excuse for people to not lend money to the less fortunate.

In medieval Europe, he said, when cities became bigger and more populous, the criteria for erecting an eruv, a boundary around an area that permits people to carry things, or, for instance, to push a stroller on Shabbat, were changed to permit many cities to create one.

"This was a major change in halachah – it changed life."

The poskim were looking for ways to make life easier, not harder, Rabbi Sperber said.

They realized, for instance, that there were local customs that were valid for people in a particular place but not in others, and that if a great personal loss is involved, one must search for a way around a problem.

In other words, he said, if two people came to the same rabbi, with the same problem, they might well get two different answers, reflecting their different economic or social states.

What happened?

One factor, Rabbi Sperber said, was the rise of the Reform movement at the beginning of the 19th century. "The first thing they did was to attack halachah, starting with minhagim, customs and moving to other areas."

The Hatam Sofer, a major scholar of the time, stood firmly against the Reformers and fought the attacks by saying any innovation in halachah is forbidden by Torah law.

"He was fighting the movement he felt was undermining the basis of halachah."

Ironically, Rabbi Sperber said, "he himself made the biggest innovation,"

Another factor that led to the development of greater halachic stringency, he said, was a new attitude that discussion of other scholars' decisions, especially disagreement, was a bad thing. "That made it difficult to come out with new approaches to halachah," he said wryly.

Before World War II, Jews tended to live in small villages, and each had its own rabbi who made halachic rulings independently, and those decisions were private. Now, the rabbi said, "everyone knows about [everyone else's decisions right away]." This makes it possible for pressure to be brought to bear on those making halachic decisions that may be controversial.

The ultimate result of this pressure, Rabbi Sperber said, can be paralysis of the halachic process.

There are some halachic arbiters willing to take a stand, he said, notably Rabbi Shlomo Goren, the former chief rabbi of the Israel Defence Forces. "The army works according to his rulings," Rabbi Sperber said.

The principles he formulated offer a way that widows of soldiers missing in action and presumed killed can remarry, most notably widows of men who died on the destroyer Eilat and the submarine Dakar, Rabbi Sperber said.

In reply to a question from the audience, Rabbi Sperber added that there is a cadre of young Israeli rabbis, often graduates of hesder yeshivot (yeshivot that combine army service with religious studies), who are not influenced by European rabbinical philosophies and might in the future be able to change the halachic process.

However, he said, they are not accepted by the haredim and "are afraid to go against them."

He criticized what he called "the politicization of halachah," referring to rabbis who issue halachic rulings on matters that are political, and not halachic.

Ve'ahavta bash for homeless

If I had money with me, I'd buy one – his little hanger people with their lifelike poses are eerily detailed.

And then, finally, I bump into Darryl; Darryl Borden, that is, Ve'ahavta's director of homeless initiatives. I've passed him several times, mistaking him for a guest in his drab jeans and childlike smile, but now I notice the crowd clamouring around and realize he's in charge.

I introduce myself and he touches me, welcoming me into his circle. He's relentlessly upbeat, loving the party and charged with an evangelistic fervour:

"Our work is changing the face of Judaism on a street level... Everything starts on a street level."

In Ve'ahavta's few years on the streets, he says, its "Jewish radiance" has rubbed off on more than 50 agencies in the Greater Toronto Area, including NaMeRes, the Native Men'Residence, which works closely with Ve'ahavta on many initiatives, including the writing contest.

Darryl volunteered with Ve'ahavta for three years before joining its staff, but after the first night, he says, "I knew this would be my vocation for life – I've been happy ever since."

He takes his hand away to wave towards the crowd.

"They were dancing here tonight," he marvels. "Clients up and dancing... up out of boxes, under bridges, ravines. It's the greatest reward. They're joining the dance of life."

The music or food isn't identifiably Jewish. Many volunteers are also not, and I wonder how street outreach touches our own community.

Does Ve'ahavta's safety net catch Jews who are drifting away? "There are many Jews out there... I find them at Covenant House," Darryl says, speaking of his intense connection with each one.

"There are Jewish boys, sons of Forest Hill... who've lost touch with Jewish culture... maybe they're hiding."

He says Ve'ahavta is "the only [Jewish organization] out there, delivering breakfast," he says.

When he finds a Jew out on the streets, Darryl mobilizes all his resources, like for one girl in the former Tent City. "She's still living at home," he says, shepping nachas that she's now off the streets.

But too often, he says, his clients "don't feel they can go home." True or not, that perception means, despite some successes, many people dancing here will retreat into boxes and ravines once their bellies are full.

"All we can do is our best," Darryl says.

As I leave, I'm smiling, and I forget to brace myself against the cold Front Street air. It's a slap in the face, and I'm just grateful my car is nearby and home isn't too far away.

Harbord seeks to restore school's war memorial

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

statue of a lone soldier in front of Harbord Collegiate Institute is a symbol that evokes fond memories of their alma mater.

The bronze statue was erected in 1921 to honour the Canadians and Harbord students killed in World War I. But since then, the soldier's bayonet has been stolen and the statue has fallen into a dire state of disrepair.

Recently, Fran Parkin, Harbord's principal, approached Murray Rubin for help. The 1950 Harbord graduate is an active member of the Harbord Club, a network of more than 2,000 alumni that provides scholarships to current students and keeps members informed on the activities of graduates. She suggested the foundation help restore the statue.

Rubin agreed to assist, but asked that a wall of honour be created near the existing statue listing the names of the Harbord students who died in World War II.

The committee received approval for the project from the Toronto District Board of Education, he said, but were told the board needed for repairs and the creation of the wall of honour would have to come from other sources.

Rubin said a war monument committee is being formed that includes such former students as chair Norm Latowsky; Nathan Leipciger, chair of the Canadian Jewish Congress's Holocaust Committee; Leslie Dan, chairman and CEO of Novopharm, one of Canada's largest generic drug makers; lawyer Edwin Goodman; and MPP Rosario Marchese.

Rubin said the committee has already sent letters to several foundations asking for funding. "But we are also looking to former students and teachers and for people and relatives of those who served in the services who went to Harbord, for donations," he said.

In a letter to Rubin, York University military historian Jack Granatstein writes he is "delighted" with the project.

"Canadians have not been very good at remembering their past," Granatstein writes. "In particular, they seem to have forgotten that the freedoms we enjoy today were hard won in wars that we did nothing to start but much to finish.

Granatstein said one way to remember and honour our history is to keep memorials in good repair. "I urge you to restore the collegiate's war memorial and to commemorate your forebears and friends who served."

In an interview, Rubin said Harbord is a school with a strong multicultural history, and during World War II, many of its students were Jewish.

"Harbord represents the success of Canada's immigration policies over the years that allowed children from immigrant families to rise to prominence," Rubin said.

He spoke of Jewish heroes such as Lou Somers, a pilot in the Royal Canadian Air Force who allowed his crew to bail out but went down with his plane after it was shot down over Holland. The plane was not found for 25 years.

For more information on the War Monument Fund, call Murray Rubin, 416-483-0985.

HELPING THE HOMELESS:

YORK UNIVERSITY
The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University
Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

Graduate Diploma in Advanced Hebrew and Jewish Studies
and
Graduate Diploma in Jewish Studies

In conjunction with the Faculty of Graduate Studies, the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University offers two Graduate Diplomas in Jewish Studies. One may be earned while enrolled in a graduate degree program at York University, the other may be earned independently, without enrolling in a concurrent program.

Diploma study will introduce students to the broad range of Jewish Studies from the study of classical texts to the sociology of contemporary Jewry. The diplomas will afford students an opportunity to enrich their knowledge of Judaism and Jewry, to increase their Hebrew language competence, and to acquire research skills in the field.

The diplomas are appropriate for scholars in Jewish history, texts, social sciences, and other areas; teachers in Jewish schools; community workers; and anyone else with a serious interest in Jewish Studies.

Some scholarships are available for graduate research in Jewish studies and for study in Israel.

For further information and applications, please see our website at http://www.yorku.ca/grads/cal/js2.htm. You may also contact Professor Michael Brown (michaelb@yorku.ca) and Professor Sara R. Horowitz (srh@yorku.ca), Diploma Coordinators; Tel: 416-736-5823; Fax 416-736-5344.

Teacher of Excellence Awards

The mediocre teacher tells.
The good teacher explains.
The superior teacher demonstrates.
The great teacher inspires.
-William Arthur Ward-

We are a group of appreciative parents and citizens who are committed to learning. We believe that curiosity and the desire to learn are inspired at an early age in many places. In order to encourage and recognize learning and excellence in our schools, we will salute ten inspirational Jewish Day School teachers each year in the City of Toronto, with ten $1,000 Teacher of Excellence Awards.

We are looking for teachers who consistently demonstrate

- Excellence - motivating students to achieve their best
- Integrity - consistently thinking, saying and doing what is right
- Respect - treating each student as valuable and full of potential
- Innovation - inspiring students to explore and make choices

Do you know a teacher in a Toronto Jewish Day School who inspired you or someone you know? We invite parents, grandparents, students, former students, school administrators and colleagues to nominate that teacher for a Teacher of Excellence award.

Please visit our web site at www.teacherawards.org to share with us the reasons why your teacher is deserving of a Teacher of Excellence award. Nomination forms may also be requested by phoning 519-621-3620 x2210. Deadline is April 30th, 2003.

At 76, Mazin keeps going and going and going...

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Volunteerism is in Monty Mazin's blood, tinues to lend a helping hand to a variety of causes. Following Pirkei Avot, he says his motto is, "To save a life is to save the world."

In 1999, he received the Governor General's Caring Canadian Award from Gov. Gen. Adrienne Clarkson "in recognition of [his] outstanding and selfless contribution to [his] community and Canada."

Mazin was born in Stepney in London, England's East End. He was stricken with polio at age three and could not walk until he was nine years old. He attended the Christian Street School and later the Jews' Free School, both in London.

His mother died of cancer at age 37 when Mazin was 16, his sister, 12, and his brother, 8.

After the evacuation of London in World War II, he worked on the East London Observer and the London Evening News as their East London correspondent covering the V1 and V2 rocket bombardments.

"Although I wasn't eligible for the army, I think I actually saw more action than many of my friends in the army. It made me realize that war has no regard for age or sex. There was anti-Semitism prior to the war but, sadly, the destruction brought everyone together and I realized the stupidity of man," Mazin says.

"My booba Bessie was my role model," he says. "She had a good name between Jews and non-Jews for her community service. She was an amazing woman and because of her, I believe in women's power. She was an Orthodox woman who could approach anyone."

He says, she told him "to walk bederech hayesherah – along the straight road – as a decent, caring and compassionate humanitarian. Zie a mensch was her favourite saying."

Throughout his life, Mazin has heeded her words and performed many mitzvot. A people person, he became known at an early age for his efforts on behalf of the underprivileged.

He came to Canada in 1956, and his cockney sense of humour and warm smile won him friends and admirers.

He married Blema Guterman, who he says encouraged him in his community activities. "She is my greatest supporter and we have two wonderful sons," he says. One is a social worker in Los Angeles and another is a Hollywood movie director.

In Canada, Mazin has worked in public relations for State of Israel Bonds in Alberta, the Jewish National Fund in Southern Ontario and later as campaign director for Associated Hebrew Schools.

Among his volunteer activities, Mazin has been active in the Rotary Club of Toronto-Don Valley, where he worked in public relations and as a fundraising consultant, and for the India Earthquake Relief Campaign of Rotary International District 7070.

Since 1969, Mazin has also worked on B'nai Brith projects. For four years, he was the mayor and chair of the B'nai Brith Jerusalem Pavilion (Caravan). He also served as chair of the Upper Israel's 50th anniversary.

As well, he served for 18 years as a volunteer on Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner campaign committee and is an honorary director of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel.

In addition, for six years, he has been a "bell-ringer" for the Salvation Army's Christmas kettle campaign, and this past year he collected a record $6,675 in three days.

He has also served as a facilitator for the Canadian Foundation for Physically Disabled Persons, as chairman of the board of directors for GEMS (Global Ed/Med Supplies) and as the bingo caller at the Wexford Home for the Aged in Scarborough.

Recently, Mazin and his wife moved to Two Neptune Drive, a condominium-style life-lease residence for independent seniors just north of Baycrest Centre at Bathurst Street. He immediately became active in the residents' council and is now its vice-president.

"We have become a family," he says of the residence. "There are so many activities. We set up an archives and I have become the official photographer. As well, we have outstanding speakers and fundraising activities and I am called the [residence's] unofficial ambassador."

He says he particularly cherishes the intergenerational sessions with the Two Neptune residents and senior kindergarten children from the Associated Hebrew School's Neptune branch next door to the building.

Bringing together the bubbies and zaides with the children, he says, "brings joy to the lives of our residents." "

Looking at the community today, he says, "I never thought I would see the poverty and homelessness again that I saw in England. Henry VIII said that 'words are not deeds' and I believe it is incumbent upon everyone to do and not to say."

He adds, "Don't give 'til it hurts, but give 'til you feel good."

CJC granted right to intervene in Hillel case

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

A week after Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) was given the right to intervene in Concordia Hillel's legal action against the Concordia Student Union (CSU), a Montreal Jewish group that opposes Israel's military presence in the territories also filed a request to intervene in the case.

The Jewish Alliance Against the Occupation (JAAO) in its application last Friday to Quebec Superior Court said CJC does not represent the whole Jewish community.

B'nai Brith working with Congress on issue

Formed in October 2000, JAAO says in its application that it is a non-profit organization with about 50 members, "including students and a professor [co-director Lillian Robinson] at Concordia University, who support the actions and policies of the defendant student union."

On Feb. 14, Superior Court justice Allan Hilton granted intervenor status to CJC, but limited its role to establishing the effect the CSU's actions and policies would have on the Canadian Jewish community.

An intervenor can participate in court proceedings actively, within certain parameters. They can argue, present documents and call, examine and cross-examine witnesses.

The permission was granted over the objections of the CSU's lawyer, Guiseppe Sciortino. Concordia, which Hillel has named as a co-party, did not contest CJC's request.

B'nai Brith Canada initially announced that it would also seek intervenor status, but instead decided to work co-operatively with CJC in order to present a united community presence, said its counsel Steven Slimovitch.

CJC counsel Frank Schlesinger said the intervention by CJC "is an important expression of the Jewish community's staunch support of Hillel students."

Jack Silverstone, CJC executive vice-president, said CJC believes this case will help determine "the responsibility of student governments on campus and the role a university administration must play in protecting all of its students."

Meanwhile, Hillel's lawyer Michael Bergman has filed a motion for an interlocutory injunction to have the court order the CSU to unconditionally restore Hillel's full rights as a member student club before the end of the current semester in early April.

This follows Bergman's filing of a $100,000 lawsuit against the CSU and application for a permanent injunction on Dec. 20. Hillel named Concordia because it claims the administration has not asserted its authority over campus facilities and CSU activities.

The suit alleges Hillel has been "effectively banned" from operating at Concordia because of resolutions adopted by the CSU in December condemning and sanctioning Hillel for having on one of its tables in November information about Mahal, a program that allows Diaspora Jews to serve in the Israel Defence Forces.

The CSU wants Hillel to apologize, to sign an agreement committing it to mutual respect and to not engage in military recruiting. All CSU-affiliated clubs have been asked to do the same, or have their funding suspended. Hillel has refused to comply.

The injunction motion includes affidavits from Hillel co-president Noah Joseph and former Concordia student and Hillel member Cliff Peskin.

Joseph states that Hillel "never authorized or had knowledge of" any Mahal flier on its table "until after the fact, at which time the paper was removed."

He states that Peskin distributed the flier without obtaining authorization.

Peskin takes full responsibility for the presence of the Mahal information. He states that he placed 20 copies of pages taken from Mahal's Web site on the Hillel table in November. "I did not speak to any Hillel executive about the flier or ask permission from anyone, I just placed them on the table."

Sciortino has filed motions to dismiss the interlocutory injunction and allegations it contains.

He claims that any charges against the CSU of violating the university's codes should be heard by the university's disciplinary panels.

He says the CSU continues to recognize Hillel as a student club, noting that CSU recognition is not necessary for a club to operate on campus. A request can simply be made to the dean of students.

March Break

My March break was fun. We stayed at the Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre Hotel. Mom says $119* to stay over with two kids is a really good deal. Two kids under 10 get to eat free in the restaurant with their Mom or Dad. And Dad was so happy when he heard about the $149* bargain package that includes parking and breakfast for Mom and him. We got to go to the Hockey Hall of Fame and we went skating across the street from the hotel. Later Dad took my brother swimming while I went shopping with Mom at the Eaton Centre and we used the discount card they gave us at the hotel. We all had lots of fun.

The End.

For reservations call 800/905-0647 and ask for rate code WPRK to receive the $119 Room-only rate. Ask for rate code PKGM for the $149 March Break Bargain package that includes self-parking and breakfast for 2 adults.

Special $119 rate is also available some Fridays and Saturdays through April.

Ottawa Jewish library to hold tribute to late volunteer

OTTAWA — A memorial dinner to commemorate the life of Gaby Sassoon, a longtime volunteer and philanthropist who died last July at 55 after a brief battle with cancer, will be held Sunday, March 23 at Ottawa's Machzikei Hadas Synagogue.

The Jewish Youth Library of Ottawa, one of the many causes supported by Sassoon, who served on its board of directors, is organizing the event.

A "tree of life," to be located permanently at the library, will be dedicated in Sassoon's memory at the dinner as part of the library's 20th anniversary "Tree of Life" fundraising campaign.

The event's guest speaker will be Judy Feld Carr, who has been recognized for her heroic efforts to rescue members of the Syrian Jewish community.

One of the first families Feld Carr rescued was named "Sasson." They were distant relatives of Gaby Sassoon, who was born in Syria and escaped with his family in 1948.

For further information on the dinner, call library director Devora Caytak at 613-729-1619 or 613-729-7712.

חושבים על אילן

"אצלנו חונגים היום את יום המשפחה
ואני חושב רק על המשפחה שלך,
על רונה, על רעייתך
על ילדיך, על אסף וטל, יפתח ונועה,
האם ניתן היה למנוע...

חושבים עליך ילדים מדן ועד אילת,
ואני חושב על הילד מטרזשטאט,
הילד שצייר מסע
אל החלל, אל שביל החלב, אל הירח,
ראה אותו אחתך בורח,
ראה אילן שנוגע,
בשמיים הכוכבים נוסע
ומצמיח שורשים עמוק בתוך ליבי,
תודה כבר אליהו התשבי..."

(מלים: אהוד מנור)

אילן רמון בחר לקחת איתו למסע בחלל תמונה שצייר ילד יהודי במחנה ההשמדה טרזשטאט, ובתמונה חלם הילד לטוס בחללית. אילן הגשים את חלומו של הילד מטרזשטאט. עכשיו הם יפגשו, הילד ואילן, מעבר לקשת, ולי, הסיפור הקטן הזה מראה כמה אנחנו כולנו מחוברים בגורל אחד, גם כשאנחנו לא יודעים את זה. וזו אולי הסיבה לקוות שנהיה קצת יותר אנושיים, יותר סבלניים ויותר רגישים זה לזה, ולא נעסוק כל כך הרבה באיך לאכול זה את זה בלי מלח. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Western world excused terrorists too long: expert

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The western world, including Canada, made a deal with the devil in the form of Islamic extremists and the reckoning has come, says Steven Emerson, a leading expert on Islamic terrorism.

For years, Islamic extremist groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas freely raised funds and recruited and trained terrorists in Canada, the United States and western Europe. Western governments turned a blind eye on these activities on the presumption that the extremists would not carry out acts of violence in the host countries, Emerson told a group of about 200 on Feb. 12, speaking under the auspices of the Asper Foundation Lecture Series, the Winnipeg Zionist Initiative and the Winnipeg Free Press.

Even after the World Trade Center was attacked the first time in 1963, Emerson said, the incident was viewed as a law enforcement problem, because only six people died. The culprits were arrested and that was the end of the problem.

It all changed on Sept. 11, 2001 – at least in some countries.

While Canada hasn't experienced terrorism of the magnitude of Sept. 11, there have been attacks on synagogues in Saskatoon and other places. Threats have been made and acts of intimidation have been carried out by Islamic militants at Concordia and York universities, as well as at other universities across the country, aimed at silencing critics of extremism or other points of view, Emerson noted.

Yet Canada is still slow to act against groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas, he added.

A longtime investigative reporter and author of American Jihad: The Terrorists Living Among Us and producer of the documentary Jihad in America, Emerson first became aware of the extent of Islamic extremism in America when he stumbled upon an Islamic conference in Oklahoma City in the early 1990s while he was a correspondent for CNN. He contacted the FBI, who knew little or nothing about Islamic extremist groups in the country.

In his speech, he noted that as recently as Feb. 10, the head of the FBI had to tell Congress that hundreds of people living in the United States with possible ties to Al Qaeda were unaccounted for.

"These people are able to hide in the United States under the radar screen," he said. "Half the terrorists involved in the first attack on the World Trade Center were under 24-hour police surveillance yet still managed to hide their intentions. It was just a matter of luck that the World Trade Center didn't collapse the first time."

The second attack, he noted, was so devilishly simple that no investigators would have caught on to it. Yet, he said, in the spring of 2001, the FBI logged 30 separate cables and warnings about Islamic terrorists training in American flight schools and planning to use planes to carry out acts of terrorism.

"It was suggested at the time that a survey should be undertaken of Middle Eastern students in American flight schools and their connections with terrorist organizations," he said. "But there was concern that that would have been considered profiling, which was politically and probably legally unacceptable then. Even after Zacarious Moussaoui, the alleged 20th hijacker, was picked up in August on a tip from French intelligence, the FBI didn't believe there was enough evidence to get a search warrant to seize his computer. This was two weeks before Sept. 11."

The problem is, he said, that democracies only act when there is blood in the streets, and Islamic extremist groups use the freedoms in place in Canada and the United States, such as freedom of speech.

"It is very difficult to stop terrorists unless there is concrete evidence of a conspiracy," he pointed out. "Under our jurisprudence, intelligence alone is not enough to bring a suspect to court.

"These groups pretend to be moderate while planning acts of terror behind the scenes."

The problem goes beyond terrorism, he said. These Islamic extremists hide behind claims of victimization to justify violent acts. Imams in mosques all over the western world exhort their followers to violence. Web sites proclaim that Islam is under attack and that Muslims are being deprived of their human rights. They claim the West is denying Muslims the right of self-determination, denounce those who speak out against them as racists and try to silence the critics.

Emerson charged that militant Muslims have inculcated in young people a perpetual sense of alienation from the western societies they live in, thereby creating a permanent underclass of disaffected individuals.

He pointed out, however, that most of the victims of Islamic extremists have been fellow Muslims, noting that extremists in Algeria have ben responsible for the murder of tens of thousands of Algerians.

The prospects for moderate Muslims are currently not bright, he said.

The clergy is overwhelmingly tethered to the radical agenda or unwilling to speak out. The only solution he sees is an Islamic reformation that would make terrorism religiously unacceptable.

Different Strokes for Different Folks

There's more than one way to get a great Jewish education, particularly if you live in a community as diverse as Toronto. With 70 schools catering to 17,000 day and supplementary school students, there's literally something for everyone. Almost every day, new programs and services are being introduced so that students of all levels and abilities have access to the tools that work best for them as they venture into their Jewish future.

Here is what's happening at a school near you:

Supplementary school has always played a big role in Heather Cohen's life. In fact, she couldn't imagine her life without it. For as long as she can remember, the 17-year-old has been heading from public school to her local synagogue several times a week to study Hebrew and learn all she can about her religion.

But just because she became a Bat Mitzvah didn't mean Heather was packing in her Jewish education, so she signed up for more. She's now in the Seminar Program at Toronto's Congregational High School, which meets at Adath Israel Congregation every Monday evening to discuss subjects of interest to Jewish teens. Topics include Jewish history, biomedical ethics, Jewish philosophy and even inter-dating. The emphasis is on group discussions and field trips.

"The school has helped me decide how I want to raise my family and how I want my Jewish home to be when I move into my own place," says Heather, who is in Grade 10 at North Toronto Collegiate Institute. "It has helped me realize how I want to live my life as a Jew."

The school, established six years ago, is a cooperative venture between five conservative synagogues in the city but welcomes students from all backgrounds.

"The school fills a void in Jewish education for those Bar and Bat Mitzvah students who didn't continue their studies at a Jewish high school," says school principal Cantor Eli Kirshblum.

Since graduating from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) in 1986, David Debow has garnered a B.A. in Physics from Yeshiva University in New York City, received his rabbinical ordination from Yeshivat Har Etzion in Israel, and served for a year in the Israel Defense Forces. He spent six years teaching Physics and Jewish Studies at Fuchs Mizrachi School, a religious Zionist school in Cleveland, and two years ago became its principal. Not bad for a public school kid who knew little Hebrew before he arrived at CHAT's Jewish Studies New Stream program.

"I was searching for something - a sense of meaning, and to deepen my knowledge of Judaism," says Rabbi Debow, 35, who plans to make aliyah with his wife and four children later this year.

"When I arrived at CHAT New Stream, the whole world of Judaic Studies opened up to me," he adds. CHAT New Stream is geared to students who have not had any previous full-time Jewish day school education or who have been out of Jewish day school for at least three years. Specially devised courses are provided in Hebrew, Bible, Rabbinics and Jewish history.

"My social circle extended to every part of the school," recalls Rabbi Debow. "I found a whole social milieu of students who shared values that I shared and I've remained close with many of them today. And the teachers exemplified a way of life that was rooted in eternal values, which I found hugely appealing."

Rabbi Eliot Feldman, New Stream co-ordinator, notes New Stream has grown from six students in 1973 to 166 this year and represents 12 to 15 per cent of CHAT's student body.

"New Stream gives students an attachment to their Jewishness," says Rabbi Feldman. "By encountering Judaism at a mature level, it becomes a very positive and stimulating experience for both themselves and their families."

The Little School That Grew

When the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School opened its doors in 1998, there were only 10 children in two grades working and playing out of two small classrooms in the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. But just five years later, the school is now brimming with more than 70 students in five grades, a dozen dedicated teachers, and an incredibly infectious spirit.

"We're serving a community that's looking for something different," says principal Elysa Cohen of the 20,000 Jews who live south of Eglinton Avenue. "Many of our parents aren't affiliated with the larger Toronto Jewish community and would probably not have chosen a Jewish education for their children had we not been in the area. We've managed to bring together all types of families from all sorts of backgrounds into one cohesive group, with parents and students extremely connected to the school, to each other, and to living Jewish downtown."

What makes the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School tick is its commitment to equality and integration. It's not affiliated with any synagogue or denomination and it respects and celebrates all forms of Jewish belief and observance. Children come from all kinds of backgrounds.

The curriculum is special, too. Rather than having separate Judaic and General Studies teachers for each grade, there's just one core teacher at each grade level (SK through Grade 4) who tackles it all by integrating Judaic, moral and spiritual issues into every lesson. Ontario's science and social studies curriculum is taken one step further to incorporate Jewish themes, arts-based activities, and language arts. For example, the Grade One class learns about light at Chanukah time so students can examine it from all angles - scientifically, multiculturally, and even socially. No topic is off limits, says Cohen, so teachers have to always be on their toes and be able to make leaps in their thinking and teaching.

Students also participate in downtown community events, including decorating the Sukkah at Mount Sinai Hospital, and baking cookies and collecting socks for the homeless.

"This approach shows students that they're not just Jewish from 1 to 3 p.m.," says Cohen. "Instead, it brings that Jewish piece forward whether it be in math, music class, or in the community."

Next fall, the school will grow yet again. It's moving into the "new" Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Centre and more than 90 students are already signed up. A Grade 5 class is set to go and parents are thrilled. "The school has given our daughter a strong sense of who she is, where she comes from and what she is capable of," says Patricia Golubev, whose child was among that first group of students. "From that first scary day she has been consistently nurtured and challenged by her wonderful teachers: as a young person seeking to understand the world, as a learner in a diverse and accepting community and, very importantly for our family, as a Jew."

Many of these programs have been enriched by community donors. To find out how you can help fund the enrichment of Jewish education for our children, call Shirley Worth, Director, Donor Development for UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow at 416.631.5837.

Once again, it is our pleasure to show you some of the wonderful things that are happening in our schools and in the BJE. These days, one hears a great deal of discouraging news, but the best antidote is to look carefully at the points of light in our schools. Each and every day young people are being engaged in their Judaism by creative teachers. While we must make every effort to combat indifference and the consequent assimilation, it is only life-contact with our literature, our values, and our history that creates the pride and courage that sustains us. We can create school environments that encourage Jewish growth, creativity, innovation - a veritable new poem for Jewish life around the world. Perhaps the new slogan to replace continuity, survival, and even renaissance should be just that: SHIRA CHADASHA - a song of renewal.

Interschool Programs Let Students Meet and Mingle

We're stronger together, which is precisely why when Toronto's day school and supplementary school students get together it is so impressive. Earlier this month, more than 600 students from senior kindergarten through high school participated in Zimriya 2003, an annual song festival held at the Toronto Centre for the Arts. Under the banner Shorashim - Roots, the musical extravaganza featured 20 choirs singing Hebrew and Yiddish songs from different cultures and eras.

This year the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto-Richmond Hill (CHAT-RH) choir made its debut, much to the delight of the younger singers.

"Music awakens our tradition," says Yael Seliger, Director of Educational Services at the Board of Jewish Education. "Songs deepen the ties between the generations and music from different cultural backgrounds educates us about tolerance and love without prejudice. Our annual Zimriya does all that and more. It's an incredibly moving experience."

On May 20th, day and supplementary school dance troupes will gather at York University for the annual Rikudiya, a dance festival co-sponsored by the Board of Jewish Education and the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre that lets young dancers at 15 schools learn from each other and share their extraordinary talents. For many of them it's one of the most anticipated events of their entire school calendar.

The annual Creative Writing Contest attracts more than 600 entries in English and Hebrew from students in Grades 1 through 12. Entries include prose, poetry and drama dealing with matters of interest and concern to the Jewish community. The contest judges are always impressed by the high literary quality of the submissions as well as their creativity. Be sure to check out the winning entries on BJE Toronto Online at www.bjetoronto.org. Selected entries will also be published in The Canadian Jewish News.

One of the highlights of the interschool programs is the annual Chidon HaTanach* (Bible Contest). This year's regionals will be held on March 2 and March 9 for supplementary and day schools. Regional winners advance to the Canadian National Bible Contest, which last year saw 200 students from 30 schools across the country compete for top honours. This year's national competition will be held in Montreal on May 11-13. The winners will go on to the International Bible Contest, held in Jerusalem every year.

Michael Kurin, a Grade 11 student at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto - Richmond Hill campus will be making his first trip to Israel this year as one of four Canadian competitors in the International Bible Contest, to be held on Yom Ha'atzmaut. He will be joined by Hillel Nadler of Yeshivat Or Chaim in Toronto, Leah Breslow of Ulpanat Orot in Toronto, and Gilad Ben-Shach of Bialik High School in Montreal.

"I'm honoured to be in competition with some of the most knowledgeable students in the world and to have learned under some of the most knowledgeable Rabbis," says Kurin, 16. "I credit my teachers at United Synagogue Day School and at CHAT-RH for getting me here - my Hebrew teachers for inspiring me to enjoy Tanach and my General Studies teachers for inspiring me to work hard. They instilled in me a desire to increase my knowledge and now I'm so excited to be going to Israel."

A phenomenon unique to Toronto is the Local Bible Contest, a team competition held for supplementary schools. "In addition to Biblical competency the local contest fosters team spirit," says Silvia Eilath, BJE Day School consultant.

Teachers Gain Invaluable Resources

Mazal Satov can't believe the difference a few courses have made to her teaching abilities. Over the past two years, Satov has spent almost every Sunday afternoon and two evenings a week at the Board of Jewish Education's Toronto Midrasha L'Morim where she and other teachers like her study a variety of Judaic subjects at an advanced level. So far she's taken courses in Tefillah, Hebrew literature, and Jewish holidays, as well as an online course through York University's Merkaz *i.t. program on how to teach Torah. Among the highlights, she says, was learning how to introduce more stories and songs into the classroom, how to make Hebrew grammar more enjoyable, and how to incorporate Jewish history into the curriculum. "The Midrasha courses are packed with so much information and material and the speakers are excellent," says Satov, who teaches Judaic Studies to Grade 6 students at Associated Hebrew School and Grade 2 students at Beth Tzedec Congregation's supplementary school. "I've learned so many new ways to teach and have acquired so many new tools to use in the classroom."

Midrasha L'Morim, which runs two 15-session semesters per year, has developed a number of unique programs for day school and supplementary school teachers and teachers-in-training. While many are currently working as teachers, others use this opportunity to upgrade their skills or learn new ways to teach. Teacher certification is granted upon completion of the full Judaic Studies track. "Through Midrasha L'Morim, our teachers are becoming much more effective at what they do and more motivated to meet the academic, social and emotional needs of the students," says Yael Seliger, Director of Educational Services at the Board of Jewish Education. "They're more energized so they're delivering the curriculum in different and exciting ways."

Two new courses have been added this year. There's Reflective Practice, where "teachers can take the time to reflect upon their experiences and beliefs so they can become better connected to their students and deliver content and strategies that are fresh and stimulating," says Ruth Rohn, BJE teacher training consultant. And there's How to Teach to Make a Difference, helping teachers and teachers-in-training meet the diverse needs of their students. There's also a two-year training program for supplementary school teachers, a series of distance learning courses offered through York University in both Judaic and General Studies, and opportunities for provincial Ministry requirements for recertification. A full-day Professional Learning Program is in the works for the spring to help teachers with classroom management, curriculum development, learning styles and more.

"The Midrasha has given me so much," says Satov. "It has allowed me to grow as a teacher and as a person. What can I say? I love it there."

Sun editor shines light on Israel's treatment at UN

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Lorrie Goldstein, editor of the Toronto Sun, has written two columns – "The UN is guilty of anti-Semitism," Feb. 9, and "Iraq and Israel? There is no comparison," Feb. 16 – that deserve our attention.

In the first piece, Goldstein reminds us that since 1982, the United Nations has held only two emergency sessions – both to condemn Israel. "No session was ever convened to condemn China's occupation of Tibet, Syria's occupation of Lebanon, the Indonesian occupation of East Timor, or the slaughters in Rwanda, the disappearances in Zaire, or any other global horror."

The singling out of Israel for special criticism, the vastly disproportionate number of resolutions passed against it, the exclusions from UN committee membership that Israel alone among all member states is subjected to (a topic also addressed by Prof. Anne Bayefsky in the National Post on Feb. 18) leads Goldstein to conclude that "to pretend, as the UN does, year after year, that Israel is the world's worst human rights violator, is not only sheer nonsense, it is anti-Semitism. And it is the UN's stock in trade."

Goldstein's second article follows from the first. It debunks, in a clear and logical manner, the charge that the UN is treating Iraq with unduly harsh measures while letting Israel off the hook for its alleged violations of UN resolutions.

As Goldstein explains, under the rarely invoked Chapter VII of the UN Charter, Iraq's unprovoked aggression toward Kuwait in 1990 was deemed to be a threat to international peace and security. Following that war, Iraq was ordered to disclose and destroy its weapons of mass destruction, but for years it has defied the UN by refusing to fully comply with these demands.

In Israel's case, it fought a defensive war in 1967 and came into possession of territory it had no intention of seizing. Since that time, in line with a Security Council resolution (242) under Chapter VI of the UN Charter, which deals with the peaceful settlement of disputes, Israel has been trying to negotiate a resolution to the conflict with its neighbours. This has been achieved with Egypt and Jordan and remains to be accomplished with Syria and the Palestinians. The bottom line is that Israel seeks peace while Iraq knows only aggression – including support for terrorist activities against Israel and its call for Israel's destruction.

While the UN's history reveals that Israel has indeed been treated most unfairly, when it comes to genuine issues of war and threats to peace, the Security Council has at least been able to determine that Iraq's aggression needs to be checked once and for all. Whether this is to be done through a regime of toughened inspections and sanctions (deemed by many to be woefully inadequate, although favoured by France and Germany) or whether by force (favoured by the United States and Britain) remains to be seen.

Israel, let us note, has no role to play in this discussion, as much as we might worry that it could become a victim of the very Iraqi aggression which must finally be eliminated.

Paul Michaels is director of communications for the Canada-Israel Committee.

Food, Scrumptious Food

The CJN's Ask Ella columnist shares recipes

[Edward Dunbar Graphic]

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Ella Burakowski has a philosophy behind her cooking.

The CJN's Ask Ella columnist, keeps it simple and cooks in quantity.

"I do my cooking on Sunday, and I always double or triple the recipe so I'll have food for when I don't feel like cooking. My Sunday meals usually take me through Wednesday or Thursday, and the rest of the week I eat out.

"I don't particularly like to cook, but I like to eat. This system works great."

She has a roster of recipes that work, she says, and she makes them over and over again. "Anything that works is a keeper."

She's conscious about fat and cholesterol, so everything has to be low fat. "I don't always follow a recipe exactly. I usually make changes that suit me."

As well, to all her friends' delight, she loves to share her recipes. "I make my favourite dishes to bring to friends' homes and I'm always prepared with the recipe. If we're not trying food, we're talking about it. It's a huge topic!"

In an effort to organize her favourites, she has put together a cookbook for her own use, Ella's Recipes. In it, she has included conversions, equivalents and, of course, nutritional breakdown.

She shared with us a few of the recipes, some with nutritional values, which she has gathered from various sources.

CHOLENT
From CJN Staffer Bev Bergman

Talk about comfort food… nothing smells better than waking up to the heavenly odor of cholent cooking in your oven.

1 tbsp. vegetable oil (to lightly cover bottom of large pot or dutch oven*)
1 large cooking onion, sliced
3 cloves garlic diced
5 peeled potatoes, cut in chunks
3 strips flanken, cut in chunks
1 strip kishke or 4 large hot dogs cut in chunks
1 cup pearl barley washed
1 cup dry baby lima beans, soaked overnight if possible
1 cup dry kidney beans
1½ tbsp. salt
pepper to taste
2-3 tbsp. paprika
1 tbsp. garlic powder
boiled water with 1 heaping tbsp. of chicken soup powder

Put all ingredients into dutch oven (not in layers, distribute it in a "mixed up" fashion). Cover with boiling water to which a heaping tablespoon of chicken soup powder has been added. Cover tightly and place in oven at 275 degrees from late afternoon until lunchtime the next day. Check the cholent in the morning and if it appears dry, add more boiling water. When reheating leftovers, you may need to add water.

* Make sure your pot does not have handles that will melt in the oven!

Barley sucks up salt and pepper, so you have to use much more seasoning that you would usually use.

Yield: 15-20 cups, each 1 fat serving, 2 starch servings and 1 protein serving.

FAUX FRIED RICE
From cousin Daniella Gold

½ large head of cauliflower (raw), grated
6-8 green onions, chopped (keep white part separate from green part)
4-6 garlic cloves, minced
1 tsp. fresh ginger, minced
¾ cup frozen peas
1 cup mushrooms, sliced
1 cup snow peas or sugar snaps (already steamed)
2-3 tbsp. low sodium soy sauce
2 whole eggs + 3-4 egg whites, beaten
1 tsp. sesame oil (optional)
oil for frying (just a little bit)

Using medium-high, heat oil in a large pan. Fry garlic, ginger and white part of onion for 1 minute. Add mushrooms for another minute. Add grated cauliflower (use the shredding blade of the cuisinart to get the correct consistency for the cauliflower). Stir for about 5 minutes. Add soy sauce and sesame oil (if using). Stir for another few minutes. Add frozen peas, steamed snow peas and green part of onion. Mix everything together.

Push entire mixture to one side of the pan. In the empty side add the beaten eggs and scramble until the eggs are just set. Mix the eggs into the "rice". Remove from heat. Add already cooked and marinated chicken breast or beef strips to make a whole meal.

ROASTED VEGETABLES

2 yams cut into pieces
3-4 potatoes cut into pieces, or lots of parisienne potatoes (saves time)
4 onions cut in quarters or eighths, or a bunch of shallots if you don't mind the time involved in peeling
5-6 carrots cut in dimes or 1½ pkg. baby carrots
20 (approx.) button mushrooms
1 cauliflower broken into medium size florets
1 red pepper cut into 1½-in. pieces
2-3 tbsp. olive oil
pepper to taste
salt to taste
any other spice you like

Preheat oven to 400. Use large pyrex or lasagna pan and heat olive oil in oven for a few minutes (this prevents the potatoes from sticking).

After oil is hot add yams and white potatoes, sprinkle with pepper and salt, roast uncovered for 20 minutes. Add the onions, carrots and mushrooms, add more pepper and salt, roast for an additional 20 minutes.

Lower oven temperature to 350 and mix in the cauliflower florets; add more pepper if desired and roast for an additional 20 minutes. Add the red pepper and roast for a final ½ hour.

This recipe can be adapted to your taste using different vegetables and different spices. Some other useable vegetables are: asparagus, brussel sprouts and zucchini.

Note: broccoli is not recommended.

UNUSUAL LASAGNA
From CJN Staffer Gloria Clamen

1 28-oz. can of diced tomatoes
1 large eggplant cut in ½-in. cubes
2 medium zucchini cut in slices
½-1 lb. portobello mushrooms cut in chunks
2 red peppers cut in chunks
1 large onion cut in chunks
2 tbsp. olive oil
2 heads of garlic
1 box no bake lasagna noodles
2 cups tomato sauce
1 lb. lean vegetarian ground meat
¼ cup shredded fresh basil
1 tbsp. chopped fresh oregano or 2 tsp. dried
½ lb part skim mozzarella, shredded or cut in chunks
2-3 tbsp. grated Parmesan cheese to taste
salt & pepper

Arrange eggplant, zucchini, mushrooms, peppers and onion on 1 or 2 baking sheets lined with foil and sprayed with cooking spray. Drizzle with olive oil and sprinkle with salt and pepper.

Cut top quarter off garlic heads and wrap garlic in foil. Place on baking sheet. Roast vegetables in preheated 350-degree oven for 40 minutes or until browned. Cook "meat" until just done.

In a large bowl, combine "meat" with roasted vegetables. Squeeze in garlic. Add can of tomatoes, tomato sauce, oregano, basil and mozzarella. Break up lasagna noodles and mix into mixture.

Transfer mixture to a 10 x 15-inch baking dish and sprinkle with Parmesan. Cover and bake in a preheated 350-degree oven for 30 minutes. Uncover and cook for 20 to 30 minutes longer, until lightly browned. Allow to rest for 10 minutes before serving. Freezes well.

Makes 15 servings: 1 vegetable, ½ fat, 2 starch, 1½ protein.

BARBECUE BRISKET

6-7 lb. brisket
2 bottles barbecue sauce
2 pkgs. onion soup mix
1 tbsp. mustard (leave out on Passover)
2 onions sliced into rings
approx. 6 tbsp. of spice paste (made of onion powder, garlic powder, paprika, salt, pepper, orange juice)

Preheat oven to 350. Put onion rings in bottom of roasting pan. Rub both sides of brisket with the spice paste. Put brisket in the pan fat side up. In a bowl, mix barbeque sauce, onion soup mix and mustard. Pour over brisket. Cover tightly with foil and cook for 3 hours (do not open oven door).

Remove from oven, let cool, trim fat, cut into slices (against the grain) and pour sauce over sliced meat. Put slices into 9 x 13-inch pyrex dish. Cover and freeze or place in fridge overnight, if using the next day. Put roast back in oven for 1-1½ hours at 250. Check periodically and baste if necessary.

This freezes well. When serving, take it out a day before and thaw in refrigerator. Cook for 1 hour at 350 or to desired tenderness before serving.

Pro-Israel questions booed at McMaster lecture

By ANITA GRANAT
Special to The CJN

The Palestinians hope for a "just and equitable peace" in the Middle East, but don't believe that Israel wants the same, says the head of the General Delegation of Palestine in Canada.

In a Feb. 3 address to a large crowd at Hamilton's McMaster University, Baker Abdel-Munem focused on what he called the "injustices" and "roadblocks" in the Palestinian-Israeli peace process.

The speech, called The Search for Freedom and Justice in Palestine, was sponsored by a group called The November 16th Coalition To Stop The Attack on Iraq, as well as by the Hamilton Palestinian community and the university's student NDP club.

Abdel-Munem was warmly received by the mainly Palestinian audience. Amid heightened security and the presence of campus security and Hamilton Wentworth Police Services, the crowd was generally respectful, but at times became vocal and raucous, especially during an open question forum.

A chemical engineer by profession, Abdel-Munem said the United Nations resolution of 1947 and the subsequent partion of British Mandate Palestine is at the root of today's unrest.

"Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza is one of the reasons for the violence," he said. That occupation, he said, has made Israel into an "army state."

"Palestinians are the only oppressed people in the world," he said.

He predicted that as long as Palestinians are denied their rights as a "nation state," they will continue their "acts of defiance." Suicide bombers are a result of their frustration and their continued existence is perpetuated by the fact that "Israel doesn't like them," he said.

In Abdel-Munem's view, the peace process has been hampered by several factors: the re-election of Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, the PLO's identity crisis and the dispersal of power in the latter part of the 20th century among smaller states that he said are controlled by the United States.

Oil reserves are not an issue, he said: the United States produces 80 per cent of its own oil. American influence in the Middle East is seen by the Palestinians as a source of unrest. The Americans, he said, wish to construct policies to further their global agenda.

Questions from the audience were written on index cards during the talk and handed to the speaker to choose from and respond to later. Most of the questions that he answered related to land claims, Israel's right to exist and the international legitimacy of the PLO. Questions deemed pro-Israeli were greeted with boos and derisive comments.

Abdel-Munem spoke of a time when Israelis and Palestinians co-existed in harmony, sharing resources and support. He equated today's gap between the two groups to "an ocean" and said he hopes that the moderates on both sides will prevail.

"It involves give and take" for any peaceful search for freedom and justice, he said, adding that he hopes freedom and justice prevail in this century.

Left-wing student sees Israel in a new light after JCS trip

By ELENNA MOSOFF

I wasn't prepared for my political beliefs and emotions to change on my last trip to Israel, but they did.

Jewish Campus Services (JCS) of Greater Toronto (now Hillel of Greater Toronto) recently brought 22 Ontario university students to Israel on a leadership advocacy trip to teach them how to make Israel's case on their campuses.

The campus organization arranged for us to meet with several speakers and participate in a variety of activities, but I was emotionally unprepared for many of them. On the first day, we went to Givat Haviva, a learning centre that engages in Israeli-Arab dialogue, and met Mohammed Darawshe, Givat Haviva's director of public relations and an Arab-Israeli. He talked about what it is like to be an Arab with Israeli citizenship and the loss of identity he feels as a result of not fitting in with the identity he is presented with – the Israeli anthem Hatikvah and the Israeli flag, for example. My sympathies went out to him.

But when Darawshe claimed that because certain terrorist organizations such as Hezbollah and Fatah have humanitarian aid wings, they are legitimate organizations, many of us found this legitimization hard to stomach. We left Givat Haviva that day with mixed feelings.

Israel gives you a strange feeling inside your gut and your heart. People who have not been there cannot generally relate to it, and when your feelings on Israel are challenged as ours were when we were talking with Darawshe, something inside you feels uncomfortable and sad.

This sadness increases as you travel along the edge of Israel's Green Line. As I stood on a high mountain range on the edge of the West Bank looking out to the Mediterranean Sea, what struck me was not only the intense beauty of the land, but also how small Israel actually is. Israel will be left with a nine-mile-wide stretch of land if the West Bank becomes a state. As I stood there, I thought of what nine miles is in Toronto terms… maybe Highway 404 to Jane Street across Highway 401.

Meeting both Jewish and Arab Israelis on this trip allowed me to learn and gain a better sense of the current sentiment in Israel. The overwhelming sentiment today among Israelis of all political viewpoints is a huge feeling of helplessness. They are living their lives on a day-to-day basis, as we learned from many people, including people who are not of a pro-Israeli mindset. They leave their houses each day not knowing if everyone will return to the dinner table at night. Meanwhile, the desperation of the Palestinians is obvious from their use of, and support of, suicide bombings. This too is a form of helplessness: both sides are trying to control a situation that has gone well beyond the power of the people. The conflict is rooted in a history that runs so deep there is hardly any telling where it begins and how it will end, if ever.

Journalists and news reporters have not been helping Israel's image in the international media, and many of the trip's sessions focused on this issue. Israel is a journalists' paradise. Because so much occurs there, media outlets plant themselves in one area (such as a hotel bar) and wait until a story breaks, as one always does. These media outlets merely reflect the political opinions of their own countries. The Palestinians receive more coverage because it is easy to tell the story of a victim.

This trip has made me feel as though I've been educated on the issues, and my belief in Israel's actions is stronger than ever. A key problem on campus today is a lack of education about the issues and a very strong, rising leftist culture that is swaying many students (myself included, before this trip) away from supporting Israel. Without such trips, people like me could very well hang onto anti-Israel sentiments simply because they aren't well-informed.

Vatican opens secret archives from World War II

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — Catholic leaders urgently called on Pope Pius XI to intervene against the Nazi persecution of the Jews – and some Vatican officials tried to work behind the scenes to do so, according to documents from newly opened Vatican archives.

Documents indicate Jewish-born nun pressed Vatican to stop Nazis

Published in the Italian media, the documents represent the first few files to surface from the huge trove of pre-World War II material unsealed by the Vatican Secret Archives on Feb. 15.

The most dramatic revelation was an impassioned appeal for papal action written in April 1933 by Edith Stein, a German Jewish convert to Catholicism who eventually was murdered in Auschwitz and in 1998 was declared a saint.

A 1934 memorandum from German Rev. Friedrich Muckermann to the Vatican secretary of state, Cardinal Eugenio Pacelli – the future Pope Pius XII – criticized the Vatican's "silence" and "lack of courage" in the face of Adolf Hitler.

But an April 1933 letter signed by Pacelli indicated that the Vatican instructed its representative in Berlin "to see if and how" it could intervene.

Without providing a full text, the Catholic news agency Zenit said the letter "gave precise instructions" to a Vatican official in Berlin "to warn the National Socialist government not to persecute the Jews."

David Kertzer, the author of the book The Popes Against the Jews, said the emergence of contradictory material was to be expected.

He predicted a "war of dribbled documents," as scholars sift through thousands of pages of newly declassified material.

"It is now clear that with the opening of the Pius XI archives, we are going, for the next couple of years, to see a periodic trumpeting of selected documents by one side or another in the debate over the Vatican's role in the Holocaust," said Kertzer, a professor at Brown University.

"It will probably be only in two to three years that the first systematic studies of the available documentation will begin to make possible a thorough understanding of what happened," he said. "This is all the more true since most of the Vatican documentation on the period is still not available and will not be entirely available to scholars for another two years."

The newly released documents were unsealed six years ahead of schedule in response to the bitter debate over the Vatican's role in the Holocaust – and in particular, over the role of Pius XII, whom critics have long accused of allowing Jews to die because of his silence.

The material concerns the Vatican's relations with prewar Nazi Germany. Mostly correspondence, the documentation dates from the pontificate of Pius XI, who reigned from 1922 until his death in February 1939.

During this time, Pacelli, who became Pope Pius XII on March 2, 1939, served both as Vatican ambassador in Berlin and as Vatican secretary of state.

So far, the letter to Pius XI from Stein, written less than three weeks after Hitler took power, has grabbed the biggest headlines.

Scholars had long known of its existence – in her 1938 autobiography, Stein herself wondered what had happened to it. In 2000, a team of Jewish and Catholic scholars charged with examining the Vatican's role in the Holocaust listed the letter as one of the documents they wanted to see to help determine the Vatican's wartime record.

The team collapsed in 2001 because it was not granted full access to unpublished archival material.

In her letter, Stein described a "war of extermination against Jewish blood."

She warned that responsibility for what was happening "also falls on those who remain silent" and implored the pope to act.

"Not just the Jews, but thousands of faithful Catholics in Germany – and, I believe, in all the world – have been waiting and hoping for weeks that the Church of Christ let its voice be heard against such abuse of the name of Christ," she wrote.

Florida court indicts eight for aiding Islamic Jihad

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Eight people, including four U.S. residents, were charged last week in a 50-count indictment with supporting, financing and relaying messages for the militant Islamic Jihad organization.

The indictment, returned by a U.S. federal grand jury in Tampa was unsealed last Thursday. It charges that the men are members of the Islamic Jihad, designated by the United States as a terrorist organization. Among them are a Palestinian professor at the University of South Florida (USF), 45-year-old Sami Amin Al-Arian, who is described as the group's American leader and secretary of its worldwide council.

The suspects include three people living in Florida and one in Chicago. Suspects in Britain, Syria, Lebanon and the Gaza Strip remain at large, U.S. Attorney General John Ashcroft said.

In Florida, Al-Arian was led in handcuffs to FBI headquarters in Tampa after the arrest. "It's all about politics," he told reporters.

Al-Arian's ties to the terror group had been known to Israel's intelligence services for a number of years and the data was passed to U.S. authorities in the context of the American investigation. Israel also gave U.S. authorities incriminating intelligence on other suspected associates of the group.

A former think-tank director brought to USF by Al-Arian, Ramadan Abdullah Salah, abruptly left in 1995 and resurfaced as the secretary-general of Islamic Jihad.

The indictment charges the eight men with operating a criminal racketeering enterprise since 1984 that supported Islamic Jihad, and with conspiracy to kill and maim people abroad, conspiracy to provide material support to the group, extortion, perjury and other charges. Each faces up to life in prison if convicted.

Al-Arian and two others were arrested in Tampa and a fourth man was arrested in Chicago. The other four were living abroad and it was not immediately clear if they had been taken into custody.

The group is described in the indictment as rejecting peaceful solutions to the Palestinian quest for a homeland in the Middle East and with embracing "the jihad solution and the martyrdom style as the only choice for liberation." The group's purpose, prosecutors allege, is to destroy Israel and end all U.S. and western influence in the region.

Among the 100 killings blamed on the Islamic Jihad in Israel and the West Bank and Gaza are those of two U.S. citizens, Alisa Flatow, 20, and Shoshana Ben-Yishai, 16. The killings included suicide bombings, car bombs and drive-by shootings, most recently a suicide attack in Haifa last June that killed 20 and injured 50.

The eight allegedly provided financial support through a number of U.S.-based entities, resolved internal conflicts, helped communicate claims of responsibility for terrorist actions and made false statements to immigration officials to help terrorists.

Those arrested in the United States were described as setting up a terrorist cell at USF. They are:

• Al-Arian, the Florida college professor the government says ran Islamic Jihad's U.S. operations. A Kuwait native, he teaches engineering.

• Sameeh Hammoudeh, 42, born in the West Bank, now a resident of Temple Terrace, Fla. He is also an instructor at USF and an administrator at the Islamic Academy of Florida.

• Hatim Naji Fariz, 30, born in Puerto Rico and now living in Spring Hill, Fla. He manages a medical clinic.

• Ghassan Zayed Ballut, 41, a West Bank native now living in Tinley Park, Ill., and owner of a small business.

Four men who live abroad were also charged. It was not immediately clear if they were also arrested. They are:

• Ramadan Abdullah Salah, 45, a Gaza Strip native and now a resident of Damascus, Syria. He is described as the worldwide leader of Islamic Jihad and is a former instructor at USF.

• Bashir Musa Mohammed Nafi, 50, originally from Egypt and now living in Oxfordshire, England. The indictment calls him the U. K. leader of the group.

• Mohammed Tasir Hassan Al-Khatib, 46, originally from Gaza and now living in Beirut; described as the treasurer of the group.

• Abd Al Aziz Awda, 52, born in Israel and now imam of the Al-Kassam Mosque in Gaza. The indictment calls him the founder and "spiritual leader" of the group.

The office of U.S. Attorney Paul Perez in Florida said last year that Al-Arian was under federal investigation.

The tenured computer engineering professor was placed on forced leave and banned from campus shortly after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks and his subsequent appearance on Fox News Channel. The school is also trying to dismiss him.

Al-Arian was quizzed about links to known terrorists and asked about tapes from the late 1980s and early 1990s in which he said "Death to Israel" in Arabic. Al-Arian has said he has never advocated violence against others and his words were a statement against Israeli occupation. He also has denied any connection to terrorists.

Israeli spymaster dies at 91

Obituary

By NAOMI SEGAL
Jewish Telegrahic Agency

JERUSALEM — Issar Harel, the Israeli master spy responsible for the capture of Nazi war criminal Adolf Eichmann, died last week at 91.

Harel, one of the founders of Israel's intelligence community, led the Shin Bet domestic security service for 15 years and the Mossad foreign intelligence agency for 11 years.

Between 1952 and 1963, he simultaneously headed both agencies, andwas considered responsible for establishing their worldwide reputations.

Among the most significant achievements during this period was the 1961 kidnapping of Eichmann in Buenos Aires, an operation Harel later recounted in his book The House on Garibaldi Street.

Harel once recalled in a television interview how he informed then-Israeli prime minister David Ben-Gurion of the successful outcome of the operation: "I brought you a present – Eichmann is here."

Fiercely devoted to his work, Harel was recalled as a man who wielded unprecedented influence and power during the period he headed Israel's security agencies.

In the 1950s, he fought efforts by Soviet bloc countries to recruit agents in Israel. As a result of his efforts, several such agents were identified.

He established an office to bring Jews to Israel from countries where such immigration was illegal. The office oversaw the mass immigration of Moroccan Jews during the 1950s.

He also developed the Mossad's ties with overseas intelligence services.

Harel left the Mossad in 1963 after a dispute with Ben-Gurion over how to deal with German scientists who were developing missiles for Egypt. Harel believed their work posed a threat to Israel and every effort, including assassination, should be made to stop them. Ben-Gurion agreed with the head of military intelligence that the situation did not pose a great risk to Israel.

In 1965, Harel served briefly as then-prime minister Levi Eshkol's intelligence adviser. In 1969, he served a term in the Knesset. Later, he devoted himself mainly to writing books.

Born in 1912 in Russia, Harel immigrated to British Mandate Palestine in 1931.

In 1939, he joined the Haganah and five years later, he was transferred to its intelligence section, which served as the foundation for the intelligence agencies established by Israel in 1948.

At the end of the War of Independence, Harel was appointed head of the General Security Services, known by its Hebrew acronym, Shin Bet.

Those who knew Harel described him as a man completely committed to his work, with leadership skills that earned the trust of his superiors and subordinates alike.

Book on Jews anti-Semitic, racist, Czech lawsuit says

By MAGNUS BENNETT
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

Critics say it is potentially more dangerous than Hitler's* Mein Kampf

PRAGUE — A Czech academic is being sued by critics who say his book claiming Jews are potentially more dangerous to today's Jews than Hitler's Mein Kampf.

Taboos in Social Sciences, by the Czech psychologist Petr Bakalar, includes the theory that Jews who left Europe before the Holocaust were more intelligent than those who stayed behind.

The chapter, "Judaism as a Group Evolutionary Strategy," also refers to differences in intelligence among racial and religious groups and the influence of Jews in Hollywood, the U.S. media and the academic world.

Czech Jewish leaders expressed concern that the book may be just an excuse to present anti-Semitic ideas under the guise of scholarship.

"Bakalar is taking the book into areas and raising questions which are quite scandalous," said the chair of the Prague Jewish community, Tomas Jelinek. "He talks, for instance, about racism and refers to an advertisement which appeared in 2001 in our Jewish monthly looking for a deputy of Jewish origin for the rabbinate office."

Prague-based sociologist Tomas Kamin is taking Bakalar to court, arguing that the book is both anti-Semitic and racist. Kamin said the author simply ignores facts that do not fit in with his theories.

"The book is more dangerous than Mein Kampf because when somebody reads Mein Kampf, they already know what happened," he said. "The main danger is that this book purports to be a scientific work but in reading it, you can either acquire or reaffirm opinions or prejudices against minorities."

Bakalar denies there is a hidden agenda to his work, claiming that he is merely presenting ideas for discussion. He said research on IQs had shown that Ashkenazi Jews had higher IQs than other Jewish groups, and that eastern European Jews had higher IQs on average Jews did not produce above-average results.

Asked about IQs in relation to the Holocaust, Bakalar replied that "it is logical that the Jews who left Europe before the Holocaust were more intelligent than those who stayed behind."

The "pogrom theory," he said, argues that citizens who are able to survive an oppressive era are more intelligent than those who fail to discern the danger.

Describing himself as a "rebel," Bakalar said he "would invite anybody, especially from the Jewish community, to give their opinions on the hypotheses in the book."

Important Message for Canada's Permanent Residents

Permanent Resident Card will soon be mandatory.

Save time and money; obtain your Permanent Resident (PR) Card before you travel.

- Who needs the new PR Card? Permanent residents (landed immigrants) returning to Canada by airplane, boat, train or bus must have a PR Card.

Canadian citizens do not need a PR Card.

- When does the PR Card become mandatory? Permanent residents returning to Canada as of December 31, 2003, by airplane, boat, train or bus, must show their PR Card to carrier personnel when boarding to prove their permanent resident status in Canada.

The PR Card replaces the IMM 1000 Record of Landing form, which will no longer be valid for travel purposes.

If you are a permanent resident returning to Canada without a valid PR Card as of December 31, 2003, you will not be permitted to board an airplane, boat, train or bus en route to Canada. You will be referred to the closest Canadian embassy or consulate to obtain a limited use travel document. This will result in travel delays and extra costs for you.

- Becoming Canadian. Many permanent residents who can become Canadian citizens are encouraged to apply for their citizenship.

- How can you get a PR Card? Application kits are available through Citizenship and Immigration Canada's web site (www.cic.gc.ca) or by calling the PR Card Call Centre (1 800 255-4541).

Applications are being processed based on your year of landing. Check the chart to see in which month you should apply, and apply early. For example, if your year of landing was 1998, you should submit your application in May 2003.

If you have missed your application period, please submit your application as soon as possible.

Shinui, NRP join Sharon's coalition

Shinui is the second party to join Sharon's new coalition, after the National Religious Party signed an agreement with Likud on Sunday.

Sharon will present his new 61-member coalition [illegible] Party as his initial partners. Several other parties could join the coalition at a later stage, although it now seems certain that Labor will be in opposition.

Far-right National Union Knesset member Benny Elon said Monday morning that his party has "severe moral qualms" over joining a government in which the secular Shinui leader is justice minister, a position that includes responsibility for appointments to the rabbinical courts.

Elon also said the government's adoption of the speech made by Sharon at the Herzliya conference in December, seen as a tacit acceptance of the eventual creation of a Palestinian state, makes it even more difficult for his party to join the coalition. Nonetheless, he added, the National Union will continue to negotiate with the Likud.

The likelihood of Shinui joining the government was made possible after the secular party and the NRP agreed on a series of guidelines on sensitive issues of state and religion – much to the anger of the haredi Shas and United Torah Judaism.

The Shinui-Likud deal gives Sharon a majority – albeit a slender 61-seat majority – in the 120-seat Knesset. But it could be bolstered if the far-right National Union, which has seven seats, is also brought in.

On Monday morning, Shas spiritual leader [illegible] cluding Shas from the coalition.

MK Gideon Sa'ar on Sunday requested that the Knesset Speaker Reuven Rivlin arrange a special Knesset sitting on Thursday so that the new government could be presented. The coalition agreements and the government's basic guidelines were to be available for viewing in the Knesset until Wednesday morning, after the National Religious Party, Shinui and the National Union Party confirmed the agreements, and after Sharon announced who the Likud ministers would be.

In order to compensate for the changes to the agreed portfolio allocation, the prime minister decided Sunday not to dissolve the science portfolio. Sources in Likud believe the government will include 22 or 23 ministers, 19 executive ministers, and three or four ministers without portfolio.

The allocation of the interior ministry portfolio to Shinui may reflect the possibility that Sharon will give the treasury portfolio to former Jerusalem mayor MK Ehud Olmert instead of Silvan Shalom, or the Foreign Ministry portfolio instead of Benjamin Netanyahu. Olmert said both before and after the elections that he would not give up the post of Jerusalem mayor unless he received a senior ministerial post.

Sharon told MK Ze'ev Boim last week that he had not promised Olmert anything, but it is thought in Likud circles that Olmert will get a such a post, probably treasury. Others discussed the possibility that Olmert would get Foreign Ministry and Netanyahu would be moved to treasury, but Netanyahu said he had no intention of taking this position, and that if he didn't remain in Foreign Ministry he would not participate in the government.

In the wake of the coalition agreement between the Likud and the NRP, Labor party leader Amram Mitzna said Labor would not negotiate with Likud [illegible] party to open negotiations with the Likud," and therefore the party will remain in the opposition, Mitzna said.

Ariel Sharon

Sharon spoke with Mitzna by telephone Sunday morning to update him on the details of the agreement that will give the centre-right government 61 MKs from Likud, NRP and Shinui. Among other things, Sharon pointed out that the deal includes a political outline for the creation of a Palestinian state. Sharon said Likud could not keep a nationalist, Zionist party like the NRP out of the government, as Labor was demanding. The prime minister also said that if Labor decides to open negotiations, it could join the government in a short time and the coalition would include Likud, Labor, Shinui and NRP.

"We find ourselves in a situation where we can make history together, and it would be a shame to miss it," Sharon told Mitzna.

But Labor MK Avraham Shochat dismissed any chance that Labor would join a unity government under Sharon's leadership.

"In my estimation, based on the reality created by the agreement between the Likud and NRP, Sharon clearly selected a right-wing, extremist government that won't pursue a peace process," Shochat told Israel Radio. "He wasn't prepared to include in the guidelines any of the minimal elements that would allow for Labor to open negotiations."

Earlier Sunday, Likud political advisor Eyal Arad said the door was not completely closed on the possibility that Labor would be in the government.

"I don't know if we'll succeed [in bringing in Labor], but I think that there is a basis in the agreement signed with NRP for Labor to join the government," he told Army Radio.

Ambassador Shlomo Argov dies at 73

By YOSSI MELMAN
Ha'artz Daily Newspapers Ltd.

JERUALEM — Shlomo Argov, former Israeli ambassador to Britain, died Sunday in Jerusalem at age 73.

Obituary

Born in Jerusalem in 1929, Argov joined the foreign service in the 1960s after completing his university studies in Washington, D.C., and London, England.

An attempt on Argov's life served as the immediate pretext for the Lebanon War. On June 3, 1982, he was shot in the head at close range by three terrorists from the Abu Nidal organization outside the Dorchester Hotel in London. Three days later, former prime minister Menachem Begin launched the "Peace For Galilee" operation.

Argov was left paralyzed by the assassination attempt. He underwent treatments in Britain and Israel, but his condition gradually deteriorated and he was hospitalized in Hadassah Mount Scopus Hospital in Jerusalem, where he remained until his death.

In July 1983, Argov spoke out against the war and the fact that it was being linked to the attempt on his life.

"Israel cannot get entangled in experiments or hopeless military adventures… If those who initiated this war in Lebanon had envisioned the scope of this adventure, it could have saved the lives of hundreds of our best young people," Argov said.

• Charges were filed against nine Israelis who allegedly provided Hezbollah with military intelligence in exchange for drugs, mainly hashish.
• MKs for the 16th Knesset were sworn in.

Feb. 18

• Israel lifted a closure on the West Bank and Gaza imposed eight days before amid security warnings. Palestinians with permits were allowed to go to their jobs in Israel.
• At least 14 Palestinians were killed in clashes in the West Bank and in a six-hour Israeli military incursion into an area of Gaza City considered a Hamas hotbed. The incursion was in response to ongoing Gaza-based rocket attacks on the Negev town of Sderot and a Feb. 15 attack on a tank in Gaza that killed four soldiers.

Feb. 19

• Likud cabinet minister Reuven Rivlin was elected Knesset speaker.
• Yad Vashem's International School for Holocaust Studies held training sessions for a group of Israeli Arabs who plan to visit Auschwitz to better understand the Holocaust.

Feb. 20

• During an address to a delegation of U.S. Jewish leaders, ex-prime minister Shimon Peres broke a long-standing policy and confirmed Israel has nuclear weapons.
• Israel is seeking changes to the U.S.-backed "road map" for Mideast peace, requiring that all initial demands be made of the Palestinians, starting with a ceasefire, a leadership change and extensive reforms, Ha'aretz reported.

Feb. 21

• Two Palestinians were killed in separate incidents in Gaza. One man who crossed into Israel was shot by troops after he crossed a fence. The second man was killed in a gun battle with Israeli troops after throwing a hand grenade.

How the Betel Centre changed Bella and Burt's life

'I was so impressed with the calibre of speakers and lectures, I decided to become a member. Suddenly my life changed. I met wonderful people who made me feel very welcome. They took an interest in me . . .'

A friend first mentioned the Bernard Betel Centre to Bella Tatoff and she decided to check it out. Her enthusiasm has now spread to her husband, Burt, and they often go to the Centre together.

When I retired almost two years ago, I didn't realize how the adjustment to not working would affect me. After getting up at 6 a.m. for the past 20 years, travelling to my job as a social worker in traffic, snow storms, and black ice; I dreamed of Spring, Summer and Fall . . . and my retirement.

I pictured myself, cleaning out my messy drawers, filling garbage bags with outdated clothes which crowded my small closet. Would some agency be thankful for my donation? Once retired and leisurely, I planned to cook gourmet meals, bake delicious cakes, and have lunch with my non-working friends, spending time with my grandchildren and sleeping late.

So what happened to all my fantasies?

To my surprise, I missed getting up early, having daily contact with co-workers, and seeing my clients. I started to procrastinate by avoiding doing chores. After all, didn't I have all the time in the world?

As weeks passed, I knew I had to find out what activities I liked. I phoned one of my friends and invited her to lunch.When she mentioned Bernard Betel Centre. I decided to check it out by going to a Tuesday morning lecture, part of Betel's Lifelong Learning Centre.

I was so impressed with the calibre of speakers and lectures, I decided to become a member. Suddenly my life changed. I met wonderful people who made me feel very welcome. They took an interest in me and shared their own life experiences with me.

I began to attend other programs such as Short Stories, Literary Lunches, Wellness Programs, Inter-Generation meetings. Overnight, I began to feel a sense of well-being; my attitude became more positive about this new phase of life.

My excitement about the Betel Centre spread to my husband Burt. One day he came home and told me his boss gave him a day off, I asked him if he could make it on a Tuesday so he could attend a program at Betel with me. He did, and was just as impressed as I was. Now he accompanies me to the lectures when he can.

I visited the Holocaust Museum in Washington, D. C.. on a trip organized by Betel with the Jewish Community Centre. Since I was a Holocaust survivor as a child it was important to me to see this memorial.

I got involved with the Centre's Book Club, and participated in the Creative Writing Classes. Before I knew it I was organizing my projects and time around the Centre's programs.

When the co-ordinator of the Inter-Generation program asked me to attend a Friday night dinner at the Betel Centre, in conjunction with university students. I called my son, Mark, who came along.

When we arrived, everyone was seated but the co-ordinator found us two seats at a table with seniors who were not regular participants. We were having a great time with them when suddenly the co-ordinator asked us to join a table of university students who had come in late. Mark seemed surprised about the change but I whispered, "change is good, we have to be flexible." -- a lesson from retirement. We moved and had a wonderful time there.

I've become so busy doing all the things I enjoy that I wonder how I had the time and energy to work for 20 years. My closets still need clearing out, I still make only simple meals, but I read, write short stories, volunteer, take courses at York University, and attend the Betel Centre.

I feel the Centre gave me a focus and their members and staff changed my life.

MEIR PANIM: NEW HOPE FOR ISRAEL'S POOR

BY: DEBBI MAIMON

For Leah and Miri Safir of Yerushalayim, the rhythm of the school day has a healing balm. It helps assuage the aching loss of their mother, who was murdered several months ago in a drive-by terrorist attack.

Meir Panim brach in Jerusalem - a total of 3500 needy are being served with hot meals daily in the Meir Panim network all around Israel

But reality comes rushing back on the walk home from school - a journey of heartbreak. As the girls mount the stairs to their apartment, the mouth-watering aromas wafting by are always from a neighbor's kitchen, never from their own. They open the door to find a cold stove in a bare kitchen, as pain and loss overwhelm them once again.

After the last customer leaves the auto shop, the girls' father, Ezra, counts up the day's scanty profits and hurries home. Hiding his dejection, he asks his daughters about their day as he hustles together some cottage cheese, vegetables and crackers for their supper. They are very quiet and pick at the food disconsolately.

Ezra's tears, always just beneath the surface since his wife's death, course down his cheeks as he draws Leah and Miri close and tries to comfort them. A hot meal a few times a week would bring them so much comfort, he thinks. What he wouldn't do to be able to ease the hunger not only in their bodies but in their broken hearts.

Combating Poverty With Love

Like a growing number of families and individuals in Israel who have fallen on hard times, Ezra's urgent search for help brought him to an organization called Meir Panim (A Friendly Face), where to his immense relief, he found a solution to his plight.
"It was the answer to my prayers," he says simply.

A non-profit organization established in 2000 by David and Rivka Zilbershlag in memory of their son, Meir Panim is a network of soup kitchens staffed by able volunteers that has evolved into an unofficial social services corps, aimed at relieving the suffering of those living below the poverty line in Israel. Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein, who is the president of Meir Panim, was the first to take upon himself to assist this important mission.

"With over 20% of Israel's citizens living in poverty, hunger is a daily reality for many families," said Moshe Lefkowitz, Meir Panim's director.

A fascinating blend of the visionary and the pragmatist, Zilbershlag, who is the editor of the Hebrew-language newspaper Bakehila and the owner of a media and public relations firm, devotes most of his life bridging the gap between religious and non-religious Jews.

David says he drew his inspiration for his humanitarian work from time-honored Jewish tradition.

"Jews have weathered all kinds of hard times throughout the centuries," he says. "One of the things which kept us together is the belief that all Jews are responsible for one another. Chessed, kindness, has the power to unite a fragmented community."

The Ambience of a Restaurant

Meir Panim soup kitchens are designed to evoke the ambience of a restaurant rather than a charity-dispensing outfit, so that those who dine there can do so without shame. Tasteful furniture, aesthetic food arrangements, caring service and not least, the excellent quality of the food, make the needy feel like honored guests instead of paupers.

The main branch is in Jerusalem near the Central Bus Station, with others in Kiryat Malachi, Kiryat Arba-Hebron, Eilat, Acre, Dimona, Ofakim and Or Akiva which serve 3,500 hot meals every day. The clientele consists of new immigrants, the unemployed, the elderly, handicapped, and victims of terror. A special camaraderie springs up among the regulars, making dining at Meir Panim a comforting experience.

One of them, 68-year old Rina Malek who immigrated from Ukraine five years ago, just finished convalescing from a hip injury. She makes the two-block walk every day with her walker

"They told me I could have the meals delivered," says Mrs. Malek, nodding gratefully at the volunteer who has helped her settle into her seat. Her lined face breaks into a gentle smile as she gestures to the familiar faces around her. "But then I wouldn't get to see all my friends here."

To Feed A Child

Not long after the opening of the branches in the development towns in the southern part of Israel, the Meir Panim staff became aware that hundreds of schoolchildren in the area were unable to afford even the low-priced, catered hot lunches that were supplied by school lunch programs.The decision was made to expand the services of the Meir Panim soup kitchens to service all the school children in the area. As of last month, the soup kitchens has been preparing daily 3,900 hot lunches, delivered in insulated cases to all the schools and kindergartens in these cities.
When terror struck Hebron last month in the "Friday Night Massacre" Meir Panim's volunteers sprang into action, providing meals for victims, their families and the mourners sitting shivah.

Meir Panim serves 3900 hot meals to needy children during their study day.

In addition to combating hunger, Meir Panim sponsors free medical and legal aid. A corps of volunteer physicians and attorneys provide essential, basic assistance for "clients" who are often without the strength, the means, or the know-how to look after their own fundamental rights

."I found out that I'm eligible for a rent subsidy. They had a lawyer here who sat down with me and helped me fill out the forms," Rafi, an elderly retired shoemaker, told us. He said his worry over falling behind in his rent had kept him from sleeping at night. His children all live overseas and he had no one to turn to, until he met up with Meir Panim.

Harnessing The Power of Giving

Another community service sponsored by Meir Panim is a remarkable enterprise called POG, (Power Of Giving - Koach Latet in Hebrew). POG gathers various second hand items in excellent condition through a toll free number operated by volunteers. These include furniture, electrical appliances, clothing, toys, books and more. Items are transported from donors' homes by the POG trucks and brought to the twelve POG distribution centers scattered throughout Israel: Jerusalem, Safed, Chatzor, Yokneam, Netanya, Petach Tikva, Kiryat Atba, Keryat Malachi, Kiryat Gat, Beer Sheva, and Eilat.

POG collects and distributes second hand items to the needy.

All items undergo a process of cataloging, repair and cleaning by an extensive network of volunteers that include youths from schools and youth movements, soldiers, a mentally handicapped group, as well as dozens of other men and women of various secular and religious backgrounds who donate of their free time in order to assist in any way.

Applicants at POG must present a document from the Municipal Welfare Services, the Ministry of Absorption, or an IDF base, certifying that they are officially recognized as needy individuals, and listing the specific articles they need. They are free to choose from the items in stock in a relaxed fashion. Payment of a token fee imparts a business-like tone to the transaction and preserves the purchaser's sense of dignity. The POG truck delivers the merchandise to the homes of the needy.

"With more and more people living in poverty, families are sometimes desperate for things as basic as a refrigerator, stove or washing machine," explained Amos Elad POG's director. "Sometimes they don't even have a bed for a child, a table and chairs, or a heater for the winter time".

This summer, Jerusalem Post reported on a family whose apartment went up in flames, leaving them destitute. The parents, Gad and Yael, were in shock, unable to think or act coherently. A social worker managed to find an apartment for them but it was completely bare.

When POG learned of the situation, they took an inventory of everything that had been burned in the fire and went to work. The next day, the "POG" truck pulled up in front of the house. While the children scampered about excitedly and husband and wife watched in amazement, workers delivered an entire household of second-hand furniture and appliances to the family, including beds, a sofa, rugs, closets in each room, blankets, tables, chairs and toys.

Gad and Yael tried to express their thanks, but were too choked up to speak. "There are no words," Yael managed, wiping her eyes. "Only G-d can repay you," said her husband, clasping one of the workers in an emotional handshake.

Celebrate with the Stars

"People often have the misconception that planning a wedding, bar or bat mitzvah has to be a stressful and tedious experience," states Marla Kay, organizer of "A Celebration of Stars," a trade show which assembles a large variety of party professionals serving the Jewish community.

"As a bridal and party consultant over the past 20 years, I know how wonderful it is to plan a simcha. There are so many details to be looked after. For the past 10 years at each of my shows, I have brought together over 60 professional "stars" of the party industry to display their wonderful products and services."

This year, the Celebration of Stars Wedding, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show will take place on Wednesday, March 5, 2003 at Beth Emeth Synagogue. It starts at 6 p.m. and runs until 10:00 p.m. This year Ritché Couture will be presenting their 2003 bridal collection on a fabulous runway fashion show, which will begin promptly at 8 p.m.

When you attend the Celebration of Stars Show, all of your entire party needs will be represented and you will be able to meet our party's finest on an informal basis. Each of the various stages of party planning will be available and by having more than one company displaying their unique talents in a particular category, you have the choice of which individual will suit your needs. You may choose from a variety of party professionals who will strive to maintain the highest standards of excellence in their particular area of expertise. You will be offered bridal and party consultants, catering (Kosher), invitations, florists, make-up artists, personalized party favours, photography, videography, cakes, creative room decor and centrepieces, orchestras, DJ's, and jewellery & giftware. Some of the "stars" are very well known in the simcha industry and there will also be some new faces as well.

"Every Celebration of Stars Bridal, Bar and Bat Mitzvah Show that I have organized has proven to be so successful for both guests and exhibitors that as soon as I finish one, I begin plans for the next one," says Kay. "Organizing a party is what I do best and I think that it is certainly reflected in my shows."

Come and see for yourself that the Celebration of Stars has got it all and is one show that you don't want to miss. Admission and parking is free. For further information ... contact Marla Kay at 905-882-2042.

Terror victim forgives her attacker

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In 1978, when she was an El Al flight attendant, Yulie Cohen-Gerstel was the victim of a terrorist attack in London by the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine.

As she and other members of the crew were about to check into a hotel for the night, they were hit by a volley of gunfire that killed two of Cohen-Gerstel's colleagues. She got off relatively lightly, having been slightly wounded in the arm by shrapnel.

For years afterward, she was angry, despite her disinclination to seek revenge against Fahad Salam, the Iraqi gunman who was given a life sentence for his role in the incident.

Two-and-a-half years ago, Cohen-Gerstel, decided to forgive Salam. She had reached the conclusion that, by virtue of his long imprisonment, he had paid for his crime.

She wrote him a letter inquiring why he had joined the Popular Front. He replied, apologizing for the pain and anguish he had caused and informing her that he had rejected terrorism and now believed that a "fair solution" of the Arab-Israeli conflict was possible.

The story of this curious pen pal relationship is the subject of Cohen-Gerstel's one-hour video diary, My Terrorist. TVOntario will broadcast it on Wednesday, March 5 at 10 p.m. and again on Sunday, March 9 at 12:30 a.m.

An upper middle-class mother of two, Cohen-Gerstel, now 47, is a sabra whose family arrived in Palestine 150 years ago and whose mother is a cousin of Ezer Weizman, Israel's defence minister in the late 1970s and its president in the 1990s.

Unlike Weizman, who ordered a retaliatory bombing raid on a Palestinian refugee camp in Lebanon to avenge the attack, Cohen-Gerstel is a left-of-centre peacenik.

Truly believing in reconciliation, she feels the Arab-Israeli conflict can only be solved if both sides overcome their mutual fears and face each other honestly.

Guided by this philosophy, as well as by the shame of Israel's role in the Sabra and Shatila massacre, Cohen-Gerstel initiated a correspondence with Salam.

In addition to her relationship with Salam, My Terrorist also details Cohen-Gerstel's friendship with a woman who lost a daughter in a suicide bombing. The woman is a rather bitter person who cannot fathom Cohen-Gerstel's contact with Salam.

As well, the documentary gives us Cohen-Gerstel's views of Israel's presence in the disputed territories ("it is tearing us up") and shows viewers a small pro-peace rally, during which right-wing hecklers hurl abuse at her.

But My Terrorist turns on Cohen-Gerstel's quixotic quest to reconcile with Salam.

Regarding him as a human being rather than a terrorist, she visits Salam in prison in Britain.

Although he refuses to talk about the attack that landed him in jail, he repeatedly apologizes through tears and asks for her help in acquiring clemency from prison authorities. Since Salam never actually appears on screen, we only know this from her description of their meeting.

Moved by his plea and his contention he has changed, she considers his request.

Cohen-Gerstel's empathy and compassion may not be appreciated by everyone who watches My Terrorist. But say this much for this documentary: it is intriguing and unusual.

Holocaust a blind spot in Hitler's secretary's eye

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

As Adolf Hitler's private secretary, Traudl Humps Junge was at the centre of his perverted universe. Yet strangely enough, she seems to have been unaware of the unprecedented destruction his malevolent policies caused.

If what she says is to be believed, she knew nothing about the Holocaust, nor of the military battles Germany fought as it sought to impose its will on the rest of Europe.

That paradox is central to Blind Spot, which opens in Toronto Feb. 28.

Produced and directed by Andre Heller and Othmar Schmiderer, this 90-minute documentary is starkly unadorned.

Occasionally drawing on a cigarette, Junge dispassionately recalls her years with Hitler, whom she looked up to as a comforting father figure.

We're treated to a torrent of well-formed recollections flowing ceaselessly from her lips. Nothing more and nothing less. No file footage of the Third Reich or World War II. No explanatory digressions. Just talk and more talk.

Junge worked for Hitler from 1942 until Nazi Germany's last gasp in April 1945 – first at his field headquarters, then at his residence and finally in his bunker in the heart of Berlin.

Now frail at age 81, she condemns her former boss as "an absolute criminal" who initiated "barbaric measures" and was blind to the sanctity of human life.

Rather than thinking in "human terms," she says, Hitler was capable only of indulging in "abstract notions."

But as she immerses herself in the past, she claims Hitler was really a "kindly old gentleman." He treated her with solicitude and adored his dog Blondie.

Junge acknowledges that, even then, she harboured "some doubts" about Hitler. Yet she was reluctant to give up her "positive image" of him, since he was nice to her and gave her a "sense of security." Summarizing her time with him, she concludes it was "an incredible adventure."

The child of a dysfunctional and apolitical family, Junge claims she was never a Nazi, merely a functionary doing a job. Her explanation sounds plausible: not every German was a Nazi.

Interestingly, Hitler rarely raised the topic of Jews in her presence. But there were exceptions to that rule.

He castigated the wife of a Nazi gauleiter (governor) in occupied Holland who had displayed sympathy over the deportation of Dutch Jews.

Lantos, Cronenberg win big at Genie Awards

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The Jewish community was well-represented among the high-profile winners at the recent Genie Awards ceremony. The Genies recognize the best in Canadian films and are handed out by the Academy of Canadian Cinema & Television.

This year, Robert Lantos, co-producer of the film Ararat, took home the Genie for Best Motion Picture, one of five Genies awarded to that film, including Best Actress (Arsinee Khanjian), Best Supporting Actor (Elias Koteas), Best Original Music Score (Mychael Danna) and Best Costume Design (Beth Pasternak).

Ararat was Atom Egoyan's personal tribute to the suffering his people experienced during the Armenian genocide of World War I.

Egoyan tells the story in a multi-layered film designed to make audiences ponder the moral issues associated with such atrocities, but he has also carefully crafted a story about love, hate and relationships.

Egoyan, who wrote, directed and co-produced the film, was absent that evening, serving on the jury at the Berlin Film Festival, thus leaving it to Lantos to accept the Genie alone, although Lantos did promise to call and wake Egoyan with the news of the award as soon as he had finished being interviewed.

Another big winner that night was Bernard Zuckerman's Savage Messiah, which won three Genies, including Best Actor (Luc Picard), Best Supporting Actress (Pascale Montpetit) and Best Adapted Screenplay (Sharon Riis).

Robert Lantos

Savage Messiah's three Genies were the surprise of the night. The film was originally produced for television but was released theatrically in Quebec and did very well at the box office there. For those who haven't seen it, Savage Messiah is the story of cult leader Roch Theriault, who presided over a commune that included his eight wives and 26 children. When a dead child, strange rituals and mental and physical abuse against the commune's women are discovered, a social worker attempts to liberate the members from Theriault's control.

David Cronenberg won the Genie for Best Director for the film Spider. Cronenberg has created a unique style and body of work that includes such films as The Dead Zone, Dead Ringers, The Fly, Crash and eXistenZ.

This was Cronenberg's 10th Genie, having previously won for his directing, screenwriting and producing talents.

The controversial film Max won a Genie for Best Sound Editing. This film tells the fictional story of Max Rothman, a veteran of the German army who returns from the front in 1918 after losing his right arm in combat.

Rothman had been an aspiring writer before World War I, but after the War, he opens an art gallery and becomes an important art dealer. He runs across another war veteran, Adolf Hitler, and thinks Hitler's art has some possibilities. Rothman attempts to encourage Hitler to pursue a career in art rather than in politics.

The film has created a bit of an uproar because it casts Hitler in a very human light and softens the usual image we have of the man. But whether one approves of the position the film takes or not, it certainly makes for a thought-provoking film.

Jewish detective Sam Klein takes to the streets again

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Allan Levine, a Winnipeg teacher and historian who first turned his hand to fiction seven years ago, has produced a third novel in his Sam Klein mystery series.

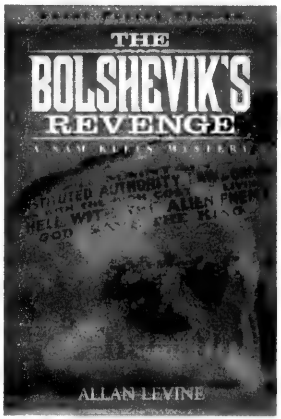
The year is 1919. The "war to end all wars" has just ended. Winnipeg is about to explode in massive labour unrest. Klein, a street-smart Jewish detective and a former bouncer in a north end brothel, has been called in to help solve a murder.

That is the premise of The Bolshevik's Revenge (Great Plains Fiction, $19.95), which takes place against the backdrop of the Winnipeg general strike of 1919.

Women have just been allowed onto the Winnipeg police force, which poses the beginnings of a dilemma for Klein – a married man with two young daughters and a pregnant wife – when he develops feelings for a policewoman with whom he is thrown together.

An even more pressing dilemma is the affair that develops between his unmarried sister, Rivka, who is strongly allied with the radical socialists, and a married man who happens to be the chief suspect in the murder.

Levine writes of that time and place with the ease of a native Winnipegger who is clearly well-versed in the city's famous labour upheavals, which he easily and credibly brings to life on the page.



He's also knowledgeable about many ideas that were floating around at the time, including the notion of genetic racial superiority, which lends an element of historical irony to the end of the novel.

Following in the great tradition of detective novelists Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler, Levine's detective is a sort of lone-riding chivalrous knight facing various moral choices, from which he is expected to emerge victorious. But Sam Klein is not significantly altered by his experiences, and sometimes seems to lack sufficient passion.

Levine has a highly competent and down-to-earth prose style, and tells the story with an omniscient narrative voice. Perhaps it's this voice that seems, at times, to distance us from the main characters and their innermost feelings.

The Bolshevik's Revenge is largely plot-driven, with a steady stream of developments, revelations and twists, all paced to keep the reader turning pages. While Levine's attention to historical detail weighs down the story in a few places, most of the story-telling is nicely streamlined.

Fans of detective fiction and Canadian history will enjoy The Bolshevik's Revenge, which follows Sins of the Suffragette and The Blood Libel as the third Sam Klein mystery published by Great Plains since 1996.

Levine, who has also published numerous works of non-fiction including an account of Jewish Resistance fighters during World War II, is clearly onto a good thing. Besides performing well in Canada, his Sam Klein books have all sold well in translation in Germany.

Like author Howard Engel's southern-Ontario-based gumshoe Benny Cooperman, Levine's Canadian Jewish detective seems to have caught the public's fancy.

Secretary claims ignorance of Holocaust

He raged against Jews and Bolshevism after an assassination attempt on his life in July 1944, the most serious ever. And, dictating his last will and testament to Junge on the eve of his suicide, he declared that Jews were responsible for Germany's looming defeat.

According to Junge, Hitler lost touch with reality immediately after the 1944 attempt on his life. He was convinced that he was on the "right path" and that Germany had to win the war. Hitler was in a state of denial.

In the final month of the war, however, he lost all hope, withdrew into himself and became listless.

As she describes their last days in his shadowy bunker, where night and day merged and everyone was subjected to "a roller coaster of emotions," Junge speaks in calm, measured tones.

Only once does she almost lose her composure, when she tells of Magda Goebbels' cold-blooded decision to poison her five young children before they could fall into the hands of Soviet soldiers.

Remembering her last encounter with Hitler, Junge says he had a blank stare and spoke slurringly as he bade her farewell, then blew out his brains.

Junge, who died the night Blind Spot premiered in Berlin last year, claims she found out about the Holocaust during the 1946 Nuremberg trials of Nazi war criminals.

Briefly arrested by the Allies, she was a secretary and a journalist in the former West Germany.

Blind Spot does not substantially add to our basic knowledge of Hitler and the Third Reich, yet it is an informative and riveting film about a dark era.

Success is more than just choosing your career

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Career decisions may not be a high priority for most adolescents, but success is something everyone understands, says stroke survivor Howard Rocket.

In a morning dedicated to long-term options, grades 7 and 8 classes at Leo Baeck Day School recently explored educational requirements for several possible professions. Speakers included rabbis, disc jockeys, chiropractors, radiologists, nurses, financial analysts and writers.

However, the strongest message of the morning was delivered by Rocket, author of A Stroke of Luck, who began his professional life as a dentist and then became a business entrepreneur. On Oct. 27, 1995, Rocket's third career chose him when he suffered a massive stroke that left him blind and paralyzed on the right side of his body.

On that day, Rocket said his goal in life became "surviving a brain attack and living each day to its fullest." Since then, he has dedicated himself to rehabilitation, learning to perform basic skills and achieving incremental successes – one day at a time.

"Since I left that operating table, my career has become being a father, a grandfather, and living each day to its fullest" Rocket said.

"I was blind, couldn't eat, move or talk." But through perseverance and a positive attitude, he made incredible strides.

Today, "I may not be able to drive by myself and take my grandchildren to hockey or ballet practice, but I can lift them on my knee with my right arm and give them a kiss.

"The important thing to remember is to be positive and apply 110 per cent of yourself to whatever career you choose," Rocket said.

In speaking to the students, Rabbi Yael Splansky said that as a fourth-generation Reform rabbi, she felt the need to pursue other interests first before beginning her rabbinical school education.

Rabbi Splansky, who is an associate rabbi at Holy Blossom Temple, talked about her many roles in the synagogue, including teacher, counsellor, fundraiser and adviser.

As a woman rabbi, Rabbi Splansky said she often finds she has to put aside her own feelings about feminism in order to help others.

Success is about learning when to compromise in order to achieve your goals, she said, and encouraged the students to think about positive ways to resolve challenges.

For example, Rabbi Splansky said, "in those situations where other Jews might have an issue with a female rabbi, they don't have a problem with me as a teacher.

"It can be frustrating and difficult to put my own feelings aside, but I'm not going to build my life on that," she said.

Motivational speaking consultant Mike Lipkin told the students that "successful people live every minute as if is the most important moment.

"Make every action one you'll feel proud of," he said.

Other speakers included chair of the board of Police Services Norm Gardner, lawyer Arthur Stern and nurse Ann Gold (Crozier).

Holy Blossom Temple Assistant Rabbi Yael Splansky is seen with Brian Lee.

New Trigeminal Neuralgia Association formed

The newly formed Trigeminal Neuralgia Association of Canada, with headquarters in Lethbridge, Alta., seeks patients, spouses, caregivers, and medical and health professionals to register with the association.

Trigeminal Neuralgia (TN) also known as tic douloureux, is an excruciating facial pain that tends to come and go in sudden shock-like attacks. It is a chronic disorder of the trigeminal nerve (fifth cranial nerve), which is the largest of the body's 12 pairs of cranial nerves. The trigeminal nerve has three branches that conduct sensation from the upper, middle and lower portions of the face, as well as the oral cavity, to the brain. TN for some, may mean brief episodes of facial pain that will come out of the blue and disappear just as quickly.

For others, it will be relentless, lightning-like bolts of pain resulting in agony for the individual.

Whatever the situation, patients need to know that trigeminal neuralgia is a treatable disorder and one in which effective management, and in many cases long-term resolution, is attainable. Although TN is not fatal, it may be a chronic problem, but effective medications and excellent neurosurgical procedures are an option.

The association's medical adviser, Dr. Anthony Kaufmann, will help establish a membership of Canadian medical, dental and other health-care professionals.

To register, send your name, address, postal code and e-mail address to: Trigeminal Neuralgia Association of Canada, 1514 Lakemount Blvd., Lethbridge, Alta., T1K 3K4 or to Marion at tnac@telus.net

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My nine year-old daughter dances twice a week after school. She comes home from school, has an early dinner and then goes to dancing until 8 p.m. When she arrives home, she always wants to have another whole dinner. I am concerned that this is too much food. Is it?

A. This is very common and not a problem. Just ensure that the choices at both dinners are filling and not overly high in fat. Protein is your best choice for prolonged satiety, so at the "first" dinner offer poultry, eggs, yogurt, milk, a peanut butter sandwich, meat or fish. At the second meal, do the same – scrambled eggs, yogurt and fruit, peanut butter and jam or cereal with milk may all suffice. Or do a tuna or turkey sandwich, with fruit or soup. As long as the dinners don't consist of chicken fingers, fried snacks, fast food and empty calories, then it's OK to eat twice. She's hungry and growing.

Q. My 14-year-old daughter has made some changes on her eating habits recently. Can you tell me if these could indicate that she may be developing an eating disorder? She is already quite thin. She has eliminated many foods she used to enjoy, she refuses to eat lunch at school or around her friends and she cooks all her own food now. I know that some of these may just be normal changes for teenage girls.

A. Many of these are common among teenage girls, but they also can lead to disordered eating. Keep a close eye on your daughter's weight and whether she's disappearing to the bathroom immediately after meals. Monitor the size of her portions and check if she eats them or just pushes the food around on her plate. Make sure she's eating protein, and be aware if she seems to be obsessed with her weight. Most importantly, discuss your concerns and suspicions with your daughter's doctor, who can monitor her weight and do necessary blood work or examinations. Eating disorders can progress quite quickly, so acting early can be critical for recovery.

Undefeated Israelis lose chance at gold medal

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As if Israelis didn't have enough to contend with these days, the country's Under-18 junior team recently suffered a cross-check to the heart at a recent IIHF Division 3 tournament in which a bureaucrat's decision prevented the team from winning a gold medal.

The IIHF ruled the Israelis started three ineligible players in its first two games and had not completed the proper forms in advance of the tournament. Instead of Israeli victories, the games were recorded as 5-0 losses and in the end, the decision relegated the Israelis to last place in the four-team tournament.

The Israeli skaters were devastated when they heard the news, none more so than 17-year-old Ziv Zukier, one of three players who joined the team from Toronto. Zukier, a forward with Vaughan Panthers Midget A, said he still can't accept that the undefeated Israelis lost the gold medal on a technicality.

"To be honest, I started crying," he said. "We were shocked and confused. We didn't know what was happening. They took it away from us for a piece of paper. Really, hockey should be played on the ice."

Many of the players were overcome with tears, said team manager Jeff Budd. But as a credit to their character, they bounced back to win their last game, 5-4, over Turkey. By the end of the tournament, held in Sarajevo, Bosnia-Herzegovina, the team had become fan favourites and were loudly cheered during the closing ceremonies, he added.

The entire episode left a bad taste in his mouth as it appeared IIHF made its decision without offering Israel an opportunity to make its case in a formal hearing. A followup hearing will likely be held in Zurich and "we're going to appeal it," Budd said.

Going into the tournament, the Israelis had reason to be optimistic. They had just completed a Canadian goodwill tour during which their skills had been sharpened by an invaluable series of exhibition games and practices. With the addition of Zukier, Michael Lubinsky and Aaron Zimner, three Canadian skaters whose parents are Israelis, team officials knew Israel matched up well against a group of teams that were not particularly strong.

Boxer was Canadian amateur champ

Leon Slan, Canadian amateur boxing champion from 1935-37, died recently in Toronto after a lengthy illness. He was 87.

Slan, who boxed under the name Lenny Stein, was born in Winnipeg and moved with his family to Toronto in 1932. He and his two brothers had to become family breadwinners after the unexpected death of their father, and Slan faced tough times during the Depression.

Slan boxed under the name Lenny Stein so that his mother wouldn't read about him in the newspapers and be worried. He was known for not staying down on the canvas. On those rare times that he was decked, he always refused the referee's outstretched hand and instead picked himself up, his son Jon recalled in his eulogy.

Slan once went a few rounds with Max Schmeling's brother. He also taught boxing classes at the Y, and often sparred with his students. One day, while sparring with a young student named Isabel Margolian, who was newly arrived from Yarmouth, N.S., he accidentally broke her hand. He called the next day to see how she was. They were married on January 18, 1942, and became sparring partners in a match that was to last 61 years, Jon recalled.

Leon Slan remembered for athleticism, gentle nature

During World War II, Slan was a member of the Queen's Own Rifles, who formed an honour guard after the funeral service.

In 1946, the Slan brothers founded Dominion Luggage and operated it successfully for 30 years. Leon continued his interest in sports, preferring golf but also playing handball, karate, tennis and bridge.

For a man who was champion at a blood sport, he was the gentlest and most soft-spoken person you ever met, Jon recalled. When his good friend Charlie Conacher died of throat cancer, he helped set up the Conacher foundation and worked at it for many years. When it wasn't quite so easy to get into the Toronto Lawn Tennis Club, he and some friends founded York Racquets just across the way, Jon said.

"Over the last couple of years, as his heart got weaker and weaker, he kept falling down with greater frequency. Eventually, he was no longer able to pick himself up off the canvas, and we would be the refs called over to lend the outstretched hand. As dad became more confused and less able to communicate, we, his family, felt increasingly deprived of his quiet strength and guidance," Jon said.

Slan is survived by his wife, Isabel, son and daughter-in-law Jon and Hannah Slan and children Elynne Goldkind and Anna Risen as well as several grandchildren.

'The players felt they'd just gotten robbed'

Israel started with a bang in Game 1, taking on the host Bosnians and dominating them. The final score was 9-1 in favour of Israel, and it could have been even more lopsided but for the restraint shown by the Israelis, who "took it easy, doing circles so as not to embarrass the Bosnians," Budd said.

Game 2 versus Iceland had been billed as the gold medal matchup between the two best teams. "That was an amazing game," Zukier said. "There was so much on the line in that game. Everybody knew what we had to do."

Israel jumped into a 4-1 first period lead and were still ahead 4-3 after two. Iceland tied the score in the third, but a late penalty against the Icelanders gave Israel the man advantage and they capitalized, scoring the winner in the last four minutes to take it 5-4.

"That was the biggest game we ever played together as a team," Zukier said. "The team was on a serious high. Everyone was so happy. It was like we won the Stanley Cup."

Israel's juniors were undefeated, but an IIHF ruling deprived them of a gold medal.

The Israelis' high was to prove short-lived.

Some time after the second win, someone – Budd would rather not say who – who had downloaded a Toronto Star story from the Internet about the three Toronto players presented it to the IIHF.

An IIHF official subsequently met with Budd. "He seemed to think we'd gotten them citizenship" so they could play in the tournament, Budd said.

Budd explained that all the players possessed dual citizenship – something not at all uncommon in international hockey – and were eligible to play.

His explanation seemed to satisfy the official, but he soon learned the federation had ruled that under its bylaws, players with multiple citizenships must prove they have participated for at least two consecutive years in the national competitions of the country they wish to represent.

In addition, the Israelis had not competed the proper forms.

"The players felt they'd just gotten robbed. They had played so hard and it was just pulled out from under them for no reasons they could understand," Budd said.

Adding insult to injury, the players heard of the forfeiture in the morning of their last game against Turkey. From an incredible high, they were brought quickly down to earth, yet they had to compose themselves for the afternoon game and then attend the evening's closing ceremonies.

The Israelis spent the morning in shock but when it came time to lace up their skates, they managed to draw on some internal reservoir of strength.

"Their heads weren't in it but they just sucked it up," Budd said. "Physically they were fine, but mentally they were elsewhere. They knew they couldn't win a medal."

Nevertheless, the Israelis battled the Turks to a 5-4 win.

"It just showed the character of the team, how tough the kids are, how much they love to play and they wanted to show everyone they wanted to prevail," Zukier said.

During the medal ceremony, polite applause greeted the gold medal winners from Iceland but warmer cheers were reserved for the fourth place Israelis. Considering the Bosnian fans had booed them during Game 1, that was quite a turnaround, Budd said.

Despite the disappointment, Budd said, "we have to look at this as a growing pain. We are a young federation and all are volunteers. We're doing the best we can. Nothing intentional was done here."

אמני - הילדה מעיר, מאת: עמלה ענת; ספרית המעלים - הקיבוץ המאוחד

במסגרת מאמצים חנעשים בארץ לחנך ילדים לערכי סובלנות, קבלת האחר, ותחירה לשלום אנו עדים לחוצאות אין-ספור של סיפורים מקוריים ומתורגמים על דמות-יצור שנראה שונה מחבריו ואולם, דווקא בעיית "האחר" הבוערת ביותר כרגע אינה זוכה לתשומת לב מספקת וחיא כמובן האחר הפלסטיני. עד כמה שאני יודעת, אין זה נובע בחכרח מעמדה פוליטית זו או אחרת אלא מפני שבמצב חנוכחי, אש אינו יודע בעצם לאן הקונפליקט מוביל ומה יביא המחר. במציאות בלתי-וודאית זו קשה אולי לדמיין סיפורת לילדים. מבחינה זו ואף מכל בחינה אחרת, הספר אמני - הילדה מעיגיר שיצא לאור לאחרונה מחווה תרומה יוצאת מן הכלל.

לאמני שאלות רבות ואבא חוסיין, שהיה מנהל בית הספר בכפר, "המשיך ללחוש לאמני מדי לילה לפני ברכת הלילה טוב' שלו שאף על פי שאין לו תשובות על כל השאלות שהיא שואלת, זה טוב בעינינו שהיא שואלת שאלות." סיהאם, אמא של אמני היא האשה היחידה שלא נולדה בכפר עיגר שהוא הכפר הצפוני ביותר בארץ ושוכן בנקודת החיבור חיפיפה שבין גבול סוריה, לבנון וישראל.

הספר מספר לנו את קורות הכפר עיגר. בגלל הכפר שייכים לכת העלוים. העלויים נבדלים בדתם ודרכי חייהם מחמוסלמים, מהנוצרים ומהיחודים. הם נרדפים ולא אחת סובלים גרוש מאדמותיהם החקלאיות. החוק המוסלמי אוסר על מוסלמים להתחתן עם בני כת העלוים. מסבא של אמני היא לומדת מנהגים שצריך לקיים, על חשיבות המספר שבע ועל קדושת הדבורה.

לאמני יש חבר טוב: קצין פלוגה ישראלי בשם יוסי. "אחר הצהרים אמני מתגנבת אל השער, מנסה לגלות במבטה את יוסי. כשהיתה מצליחה לזהות אותו בין החיילים וצועקת: 'יוסי', יוסי, הוא היה ממהר לגשת אליה." כשיוסי לא עסוק בשמירה, הוא יושב עם אמני ליד עץ התאנה הגדול שבכניסה לכפר. יוסי יודע ערבית וחוא גם מלמד את אמני עברית. יום עצוב אחד, כשאמני מגיעה לגדר לחפש את חברה יוסי, התקרב אליה אחד החיילים ואומר לה: "החבר שלך יוסי נפצע בהתקלות". למשמע החדשות האיומות אמני ממררת בבכי וזועקת: "זה לא יכול להיות, זה לא יכול להיות!" אבא חוסין עושה מאמצים לאתר את בית החולים בו שוכב יוסי אך בבית החולים סבורים שאמני תבהל למראה יוסי הפצוע.

אמני - הילדה מעיגיר; כל הכבוד.

CARROT CUMIN SOUP W/TOASTED PECANS

Soup: 3/4 cup onion, chopped
1 3/4 cup carrots, sliced thin
1/2 tsp. salt or to taste
2 tblsp. margarine
1/2 tsp. ground cumin
2 cups water

Pecans:
2 tblsps. pecans, chopped coarse
1 tsp. margarine

Can be prepared in 45 minutes or less. Preheat oven to 350°F. In a saucepan cook onion in margarine over moderate heat, stirring, until softened. Add carrots, cumin, salt, stirring, 1 minute. Add water and simmer mixture, covered for 25 minutes or until carrots are very tender.

Prepare pecans while carrot soup is simmering. On a baking sheet toast pecans in middle of oven, 8 minutes, or until fragrant. Toss pecans with margarine and salt to taste.

In a blender purée soup until smooth. Divide soup between 2 soup bowls and top with pecans. Makes 2 3/4 cups, serving 2.

The Ultimate Healthy Eating Plan (that still leaves room for chocolate) by Liz Pearson and Mairlyn Smith (Whitecap, $24.95) makes healthy eating fun. An excellent source of easy-to-digest nutritional information, it includes the latest research on flax, soy, broccoli, green tea, red wine, grains, nuts… and chocolate! Packed with terrific tips plus 100 delicious, uncomplicated recipes for a busy lifestyle, most are suitable for the kosher cook.

Triangular-shaped hamantaschen, with their sweet fillings hidden inside, are symbolic of the hidden aspect of the miracle of Purim. The following two treats are perfect for Purim – and they're also good for you. Now that's a miracle!

DATE SQUARES

13-oz pkg. pitted dates (2 cups)
1 cup water
¼ cup juice and finely chopped zest of 1 orange
1½ cups whole wheat flour
1½ cups quick oats
¾ cup brown sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
⅓ cup canola oil
½ cup orange juice concentrate

In a medium saucepan, bring dates and water to a boil. Reduce heat to low and stir till it becomes a thick paste. Remove from heat. Stir in zest and juice from orange. Set aside to cool.

Preheat oven to 350. Line an 8 x 8-inch pan with foil or parchment paper.

In a medium bowl, mix together whole wheat flour, quick oats, brown sugar and cinnamon.

In a small bowl, mix together oil and orange juice concentrate. Pour into flour mixture. Mix together until flour mixture looks wet. Pat half of this into bottom of pan. Spread date mixture on top. Spoon over remaining flour mixture. Lightly press down. Bake for 30 minutes. Cool completely. Cut into 16 pieces (see Norene's Note).

244 calories each, 3.8 g protein, 5.5 g fat, 4.3 g fibre, 5 mg sodium, 45 g carbohydrate. Norene's Note: For Purim, cut into 9 squares; cut each square in half diagonally to make 18 triangles.

GORP

Mini chocolate chips go farther, so you feel like you are eating more chocolate per bite!

2 tbsp. raisins
2 tbsp. dried, chopped apricots (about 4)
¼ cup almonds or peanuts
1 tbsp. mini chocolate chips

Mix everything together in a bowl and then divide in half. Put into 2 separate mini plastic bags so you don't eat the whole thing in one sitting! Makes 2 servings.

170 calories per serving, 3.4 g protein, 8.0 g fat, 3.8 g fibre, 10 mg sodium, 20 g carbohydrate.

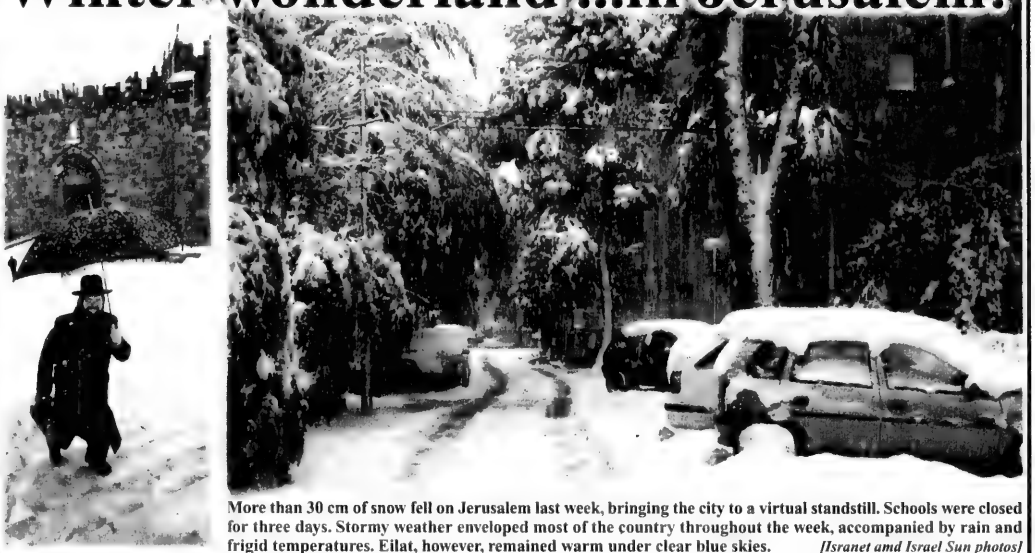
Winter wonderland ...in Jerusalem!



More than 30 cm of snow fell on Jerusalem last week, bringing the city to a virtual standstill. Schools were closed for three days. Stormy weather enveloped most of the country throughout the week, accompanied by rain and frigid temperatures. Eilat, however, remained warm under clear blue skies. [Israel amd Israel Sun photos]

Rights group compares animal slaughter to Holocaust

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A public relations campaign that compares Holocaust victims to chickens, hogs, cattle and other animals is being slammed by Jewish groups as outrageous and offensive.

The "Holocaust on Your Plate" campaign was launched last week in San Francisco by People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA). It argues the factory farm system and animal slaughterhouses parallel the Nazi destruction of European Jewry.

The campaign consists of eight 60-square-foot panels depicting scenes from factory farms and slaughterhouses juxtaposed alongside photographs from Nazi death camps. The display, which debuted in a plaza in Berkeley, is expected to go on a national tour with a possible stop in Canada.

P.R. campaign may come to Canada

PETA's Web site states the display is "inspired by the words of Jewish scholars" and it quotes novelist Isaac Bashevis Singer saying "in relation to animals, all people are Nazis."

"PETA wants to stimulate contemplation of how the victimization of Jews, Gypsies, homosexuals, and others characterized as 'life unworthy of life' during the Holocaust, parallels the way that modern society abuses and justifies the slaughter of animals," states a PETA news release. The release is titled "PETA seeks approval from Jewish community for 'Holocaust on Your Plate' national tour."

Manuel Prutschi, national director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, said "in this campaign, they don't care at all about the sensitivities of Holocaust survivors, Gypsies, gays, lesbians and those persecuted by the Nazis."

The News in Brief

CANADA

Rozanski Going South

GUELPH, Ont. — Mordechai Rozanski, the University of Guelph's president since 1993, said last week he is leaving to become president of New Jersey's Rider University on Aug. 1. The Chinese history scholar said he accepted the position in part so his U.S.-born wife could be near relatives in New York City. Last fall, Rozanski, a native of Poland whose parents survived the Holocaust, issued a report for the Ontario government that called for a $1.8-billion increase in public-school funding.

Terrorist in Court

TORONTO — Palestinian terrorist Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad's 15-year journey through the Canadian immigration system continues April 16. Mohammad, a former member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, wants the Federal Court of Canada to review an Immigration and Refugee Board decision that refused to accept his pardon by the Greek government. In 1969, Mohammad and a second man shot up an Israeli airplane in Athens, killing one man. Greece pardoned and released him one year later when other terrorists hijacked a plane and demanded his release.

ISRAEL

Israeli Ad Boycott

JERUSALEM — A Palestinian group has called on Palestinian newspapers to stop publishing ads for Israeli-made products. The Ramallah-based Popular Committee for Boycotting Israeli Products says promotion of Israeli products harms the Palestinian economy, the Jerusalem Post reported.

New Terror Proof

JERUSALEM — Documents found recently in the Gaza offices of the Palestinian Preventive Security Service provide new proof the Palestinian Authority is financing terror, Israeli Foreign Ministry officials said last month. Copies of cheques and other documents show fund transfers from Palestinian security officials to terror groups, they said.

War Resister Hearing

JERUSALEM — An Israeli conscientious objector is slated to get a hearing before a special army board. Five months after Dror Boymel was first jailed for refusing to serve in the West Bank and Gaza, the army agreed to grant him the hearing after the Association for Civil Rights in Israel appealed to the High Court of Justice, Ha'aretz reported. Ten Israeli conscientious objectors are currently in military jails, including Yonatan Ben-Artzi, nephew of Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

WORLD

JDL Guilty Plea

LOS ANGELES — Jewish Defence League leader Earl Krugel, 60, pleaded guilty last month to charges that he plotted with the JDL's late national chairman, Irv Rubin, to bomb a California mosque and the offices of U.S. congressman Darrell Issa, who is of Lebanese descent. He faces up to 10 years in jail for the second offence and could receive up to 10 more years for the first when he is sentenced May 19. Prison authorities say the Montreal-born Rubin committed suicide last year in custody while awaiting trial.

Cleric Guilty

LONDON — A London-based Muslim cleric accused of supporting Osama bin Laden has been found guilty of urging his followers to kill Jews and others. Sheik Abdullah Faisal was convicted of three charges of incitement to murder. Faisal, who was arrested by British anti-terrorist police last year, was to be sentenced this week and could face life in prison.

Attacker Sentenced

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — A Michigan court sentenced a high school student earlier this month for ethnic intimidation. Last July, Ghassan Issa, 18, whose father is Palestinian, threatened a Jewish student at the University of Michigan with ethnic slurs and also threw a bottle at him. The victim, Daniel Aghion, who was wearing a kippah and a T-shirt supporting Israel at the time of the incident, said he pressed charges because "this kind of stuff happens on campus all the time" and hopes would-be offenders will "think twice about doing something like that again." Issa was sentenced to 100 hours of community service with a Jewish organization and two years probation. He was also ordered to take an anger management course and write a paper on anti-Semitism.

Racist Incidents Up

LONDON — There were 350 anti-Semitic incidents in the United Kingdom in 2002, up from 310 a year before, according to a Jewish security group. The Community Security Trust noted a large increase last spring – 94 incidents in April and May – when Israel mounted a counter-terror offensive in the West Bank.

Belgian Letter

BRUSSELS — Belgium's foreign minister Louis Michel wrote an open letter to Israel last week, expressing regret about soured relations between the two countries over a Belgian court decision last month enabling the prosecution of Israelis involved in the 1982 Lebanon War. In a letter to "my Israeli friends" that ran in Israeli and Belgian newspapers, he said a Belgian law giving judges universal jurisdiction for war crimes is not aimed at Israel. Israel recalled its ambassador over the ruling, which would allow Belgian courts to try Ariel Sharon for killings by Christian Phalangists in the Sabra and Shatila refugee camps after he steps down as prime minister.

$132 Million (US) for Survivors

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A group involved in Holocaust-era restitution efforts plans to distribute $132 million (US) over the next 10 years to elderly Holocaust survivors.

The International Commission on Holocaust-Era Insurance Claims announced the plan last week. Last October, it reached a deal with the German government and industry for the benefit of Jewish victims of Nazi persecution.

ICHEIC decided the funds will be distributed to social service agencies that assist needy survivors. Of the $15 million being allocated this year worldwide, $6 million will be disbursed for services in Israel.

"While the funds are some 60 years too late in coming, the need to obtain the funds while there is still the opportunity to care for survivors was imperative," said ICHEIC chair Lawrence Eagleburger.

ICHEIC has asked the Claims Conference to implement the initial distribution.

Toronto hate crimes down; Jews most targeted

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Hate and bias crimes plummeted by 35 per cent last year, but the number of incidents involving Jews was down only 13.8 per cent, according to the 2002 Annual Hate/Bias Crime Statistical Report released recently by the Toronto Police Service' hate crime unit.

Police ready to fight anti-Semitism, forum told

please see page 18

Jews were the single-most frequently targeted group in Toronto in 2002, experiencing 50 hate or bias incidents. Blacks were the second most frequently victimized group, experiencing 44 recorded occurrences.

The 2002 results continue a trend that began in 1998 that has seen a steady rise in the number of incidents involving Jews. Twenty-four incidents were recorded in 1998, 35 in both 1999 and 2000 and 58 in 2001.

Of the 50 incidents affecting Jews in 2002, 19 were considered mischief (mostly graffiti), 14 were threats and six involved bomb threats. Only three assaults were recorded.

"Considering there are 180,000 Jews in the Greater Toronto Area, 50 is not a huge number," said Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress' Ontario region. "I certainly don't mean to minimize the dramatic effect on anybody or any institution. It means that while there has been an increase, Canada is not France."

Of the 219 offences recorded in all of Toronto last year, 67 were considered mischief, 48 involved the promotion of hatred and 45 were categorized as threats.

The drop in occurrences from 2002 to 2001 brings last year's numbers more in line with the long term average recorded since the unit began collecting statistics in 1993. The dramatic drop in occurrences last year is attributable to the spike in numbers in 2001 after the 9/11 terrorist attacks in New York and Washington, the report stated.

The 338 incidents recorded in 2001 included 121 directly attributable to the period immediately after the 9/11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington.

"Analysis has shown individual hate mongers were responsible for the majority of wilful promotion of hatred offences (hate propaganda)," the report stated.

"In 2002, as in past years, the known activities of organized hate groups were relatively limited. The majority of these groups have gone underground. In the past, recruitment was a labour intensive task; now, most hate groups have Web sites that are easily accessible and available locally, nationally and internationally. Consequently, these Web sites are also used as a tool for recruitment of new members. Message boards and chat rooms on the hate groups' Web sites are increasingly used for communication within the groups and between the groups and various opponents," the report stated.

"Organized groups are still around," said Det. James Hogan of the hate crime unit. "I think they're in a bit of a dormant stage. Some have relocated to London," others to communities west of Toronto.

In compiling its statistics, the hate crime unit included only those incidents that could be defined as a hate crime under the Criminal Code. Hogan suggested the statistics are an underestimate of the true numbers, perhaps by a factor of 10. "The numbers we gather are just an indication," he said. "They represent 10 to 15 per cent of actual occurrences. That being said, I'm glad they're down."

Rudner noted that "in this particular time, we have challenges facing this community. But the report recorded only a handful of physical assaults and all of them were directed against institutional buildings, not individuals."

One high profile incident, the July murder of David Rosenzweig, is not included in the report. Hogan said the occurrence was not included as a hate motivated crime because "we don't have any evidence that it is."

Rosenzweig was stabbed in the back outside a kosher restaurant while he waited

STEELES MEMORIAL CHAPEL

Pre-Arrangement — Purchasing Peace of Mind

For some, it is relief and peace of mind knowing that their wishes are now recorded and will some day be honoured by their family.

For others, it is to unburden loved ones of financial decisions at an emotional time.

For STEELES MEMORIAL CHAPEL it is a solid and guaranteed commitment to serving Jewish families according to their wishes.

Setting a public example

From the editor's desk

The following are a few desultory thoughts on some of the events of last week.

One of the most important responsibilities of people who hold elected or public office, I have often written, is the responsibility of setting a laudable example for others.

This is especially important in democracies because democracy is predicated upon ongoing citizen involvement. The level of participation is directly related to the level of respect held by citizens, the "ordinary folk," as it were, for society's key institutions, foremost among which is our government. That level of respect, in turn, is directly related to the public example set by elected officials.

Public example, of course, includes the tawdry theatre of election campaigns. I say theatre because most voters attribute a measure of the "unreal," of acting, to the pronouncements and promises made on the hustings. We expect, though we are not reconciled to, the inevitable explaining away of those same promises made so earnestly during the campaign once the votes are counted and the government benches comfortably filled.

But the more meaningful public example set by elected officials, by far, derives from how they carry out their mundane, day-to-day duties.

Jewish tradition captures this truth in an expression that, sadly, loses a great deal of its alliterative charm in translation: "A person shows his true nature by how he spends money (b'ceeso), how he behaves when he drinks (b'cosso), and what he says when he is angry (b'ca'asso).

This brings us to the abysmal public example set last week by Liberal MP Carolyn Parrish. "Damn Americans, I hate those bastards," she said to no one in particular, but, as it turned out, to the whole world, as she walked past a reporters' scrum in the foyer of the House of Commons.

Realizing she had made herself look very bad in the eyes of most of her colleagues and in eyes of the public, Parrish issued an apology the following day, saying that her outburst "did not represent her personal opinion of the American people." She also sent an apology to the American ambassador.

But who among us believes Parrish's true feelings were not expressed in the spontaneous, unprovoked, dismissive, angry pronouncement, rather than in her self-preservatory apology?

If such an outburst were only petulant and peevish, it would speak volumes about the character of the MP.

If, however, the outburst were petulant and also reflected the MP's deeply held feelings, it would also be a statement about her judgement and a warning to us all about her suitability to hold a position of high responsibility.

What example has she set for Canadians, especially younger Canadians, regarding the public comportment of our elected officials?

Meanwhile, Prime Minister Jean Chrétien shrugged off the incident. He told the press the matter was officially closed once Parrish apologized in the Commons and sent her letter to the American ambassador.

But Chrétien's response was inadequate. He failed to recognize the importance of responding publicly to his colleague's odious remarks. He should have publicly rebuked Parrish; he should have placed on the record the utter unacceptability of her and any similar such remarks; he should have deplored her outburst as an inappropriate, embarrassing incontinence, falling far below the minimum standard of conduct expected of our elected officials.

In the end, the prime minister's silence was itself a failure to set a proper example for the Canadian people.

With regard to Ernst Zundel's claim for refugee status, however, the government, if not the prime minister, is setting a commendable public example in vigorously opposing it.

Zundel, who had lived in Canada without becoming a Canadian citizen from 1958 to 2001, was deported last month from the United States, where he moved last fall. The Americans did not want him there. All Canadians should be happy that the government does not want him here either. Canadian officials are trying to obtain a court order allowing Zundel's deportation to Germany, whence he came more than three decades ago, and where he is a citizen.

Zundel is being detained in Niagara Falls as the case proceeds. He is, of course, no stranger to legal proceedings and to the Canadian justice system.

Let us hope his next legal process is in a German court.

Anti-American demonstrations continued last week around the world. One argument against a possible invasion of Iraq that was proclaimed by a demonstrator in Bahrain and was reproduced in the National Post caught my attention.

"Bush is the carbon copy of Hitler who is planning a genocide against the Iraqi people," the demonstrator said.

How ignorant and how dangerous!

If this is the extent of what people know about Adolf Hitler and the Shoah, then the lesson of World War II has been lost. And if that lesson has been lost, what perils possibly await us in the future?

Baranovski murder case delayed after one day

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The murder trial of three young men charged in the beating death of teenager Dmitri (Matti) Baranovski was delayed indefinitely last week after only one day of evidence.

A publication ban was imposed on the media regarding the reason for the delay, but in the one day of evidence, court heard a disturbing account of the way Baranovski died.

In opening remarks to the five-man, seven-woman jury, Crown attorney Michael Blain outlined the case he hopes to present over the course of the trial, which is expected to last up to four months.

On the evening of Nov. 14, 1999, a Sunday, Baranovski was "hanging out" with some friends at a picnic table in G. Ross Lord Park when another group of youths entered the park. They "were looking for a group with whom they'd had a dispute" earlier in the week at school in which someone had pulled a knife, Blain said. They were looking for "the Russians," but "they found instead Matti Baranovski's group."

Detailing what he expected the evidence to show, Blain said the group had planned to "ambush" the Russians in the park.

He said one witness will testify that one of the accused, Daniel Weiz, called him the day of the incident to tell him there would be a confrontation in the park that night. When they group arrived in the park and couldn't find the Russians, someone in the group suggested they rob the Baranovski group.

Some witnesses will testify that Meir Mariani, another one of the accused, came up with the idea, while others will say he agreed to the idea, Blain said.

Blain said the evidence will show that the accused, Weiz, 22, Mariani, 19, and William Cochrane, 19, were parties to the fatal beating. The three are charged with second degree murder.

The sequence that led to the assault began when "some of the group came up and asked for a cigarette, and took the whole pack." The demands escalated for "weed and money," Blain said.

Publication ban put on media regarding reasons

Matti was singled out, Blain continued, when he objected to the demands and refused to give them anything.

The 15-year-old was quickly surrounded by the gang; his friends headed to a nearby apartment building at 300 Antibes Dr. to call police.

The evidence will show that Mariani "tripped or pushed Dmitri Baranovski to the ground," Blain said. Once down, when he was "virtually helpless," several people continued to kick him.

Baranovski endured multiple kicks and Blain said he expected a forensic pathologist who performed the autopsy on Baranovski to testify the youth suffered five or six blows to the head.

"One particular blow was fatal that caused Dmitri Baranovski's neck and head to extend and tear open an artery that bled and caused his death," the Crown prosecutor said.

Following the beating, one of the group signalled to the others to flee, but a couple of jackets were left behind, Blain said.

Shortly afterward, a member of the group who is not charged in the killing boasted about the beating, but recanted his statements when he learned how serious the incident had become. He is expected to testify about the events that night, Blain said.

Alexander Grinevitch was the Crown's first witness.

A friend of Baranovski, Grinevitch testified that the two of them walked to the park at around 8 p.m. to meet a small group of friends. Baranovski left for about 20 minutes to tend to some homework and in the meantime, Grinevitch said, about seven or eight people appeared. They walked around the table where his group was talking. One of them was wearing a dark-coloured bandanna with white "ornaments" that covered the lower part of his face, Grinevitch said.

He testified he could not identify any of them, but "I noticed that most of them were wearing black."

A few minutes later, Baranovski returned with a girl named Marina. Grinevitch said he and Marina left the group to talk in an area in the park about 20 metres away, behind some bushes.

They were later distracted from their conversation by what appeared to be "arguing and pushing, or something like that," Grinevitch testified, saying he didn't pay much attention to it and he and Marina continued to talk. He said later he noticed the altercation was continuing and "I saw the swing of the foot and the hit." There were about five people standing near a person on the ground and shortly afterward, he said, he saw the group running out of the park. One, he noticed, had a goatee.

He said when he went to see who was on the ground, he found Baranovski lying face down on a sidewalk. "I tried to wake him up, he was unconscious."

Grinevitch said he tried to drag Baranovski to the nearby building at 300 Antibes Dr., but soon found he was too heavy. He said he left him with Marina and went to the building to call an ambulance, but found his friends already there making the call.

Grinevitch said he had "no clue" as to who was in the group of attackers.

Blain told the jury he expected the first group of Crown witnesses to include Baranovski's friends, while the second group will include members of the group who came to the park with the three accused men.

Toronto man loses 30 lbs., keeps it off – then loses more!

Hi, my name is Joey Thernesz. On a whim, I stopped in at a Positive Changes Hypnosis Centre to inquire about weight loss. I approached hypnotism as a last resort.

Up to then, I had been on numerous diets and exercise programs, where I succeeded up to a point but failed again and again.

I was overweight at 177 lbs., my clothes were tight and my jeans size had increased repeatedly. I hated looking at myself in the mirror and hated looking at any photographs of myself.

I was indulging in everything I fancied: chocolate bars, donuts, hamburgers, milkshakes, cakes, tons of ice cream, and more. I spent an awful lot of money on food — mostly junk food.

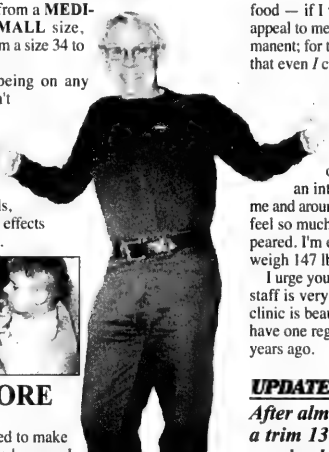
After the first hypnotic session, it seems my whole life changed. I virtually floated out of the clinic.

I began purchasing vegetables and fruit. I now sleep up to 8 hours every night whereas before, I would sleep four or five hours and perhaps snooze in the afternoon, between eating binges. Now I awake refreshed and alive.

The most important benefit was the immediate weight loss. I was quite unprepared for this. A miracle! Gradually, the belt was tightened to the next level, and the next, until I reached the end. I went from a MEDIUM to a SMALL size, my pants from a size 34 to 30.

By not being on any "diet", I don't have to get off any "diet". There is no calorie counting, pills, negative side effects or starvation.

BEFORE



AFTER

I've learned to make better choices because I want to, not because I have to. There is nothing to stop me from overeating or from eating junk food — if I were so inclined. It simply doesn't appeal to me. I feel that this change will be permanent; for the rest of my life, this is something that even I can manage.

I no longer dwell on food or the next meal because other things happening in my life are more important. Food is no longer an obsession. What I do feel is a sense of joy, a more positive outlook and an interest in everything going on with me and around me. I have more pep, energy and feel so much more alive. Cravings have disappeared. I'm eating less and enjoying it more. I weigh 147 lbs. and I feel great!

I urge you to call Positive Changes now. The staff is very professional and helpful and the clinic is beautiful, warm, and comfortable. If I have one regret, it's that I wish I had done this years ago.

UPDATE — TWO YEARS LATER:

After almost two years, I'm down to a trim 136 lbs. Meanwhile, having received my certification as a hypnotist, I'm now helping clients at a local Positive Changes Hypnosis Centre.

Daniel Pearl's murder 'opportunity to fight hate'

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Moments before Daniel Pearl was brutally murdered by Muslim extremists in Pakistan, he uttered 11 words with a gun pointed at his head: "My father is Jewish. My mother is Jewish. I am Jewish."

"What did he mean by saying these words?" asked his father Judea Pearl at a memorial last week in Toronto at Beth Tzedec Congregation, one of many in Europe, North America and Israel held to mark the one-year anniversary of the Wall Street Journal reporter's murder.

"[He meant] I am historically compelled to seek understanding."

Indeed, Daniel Pearl's raison d'etre was to seek out the truth. He was in Pakistan to better understand the roots of fanatical Islam and to give underground Muslim groups a chance to tell their story.

Tragically, he was abducted last January and later murdered.

Now, his father, a computer science professor at UCLA, is trying to avenge Daniel's death by nurturing the same understanding his son sought.

"The hate that killed Danny has created the opportunity to fight hate," Pearl told the hundreds gathered at the memorial.

"Hatred killed our son and hatred we should fight for the rest of our lives."

Daniel Pearl [File photo]

The memorial, sponsored by Beth Tzedec, the Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies and Baycrest Centre, was attended by numerous dignitaries, including Toronto Mayor Mel Lastman, NDP MP Bill Blaikie, MPP Monte Kwinter and consuls general from more than 10 countries.

Pearl, the author of three books, has travelled across the globe trying to spread the messages of pluralism and diversity, which his son strongly believed in.

He has been to Pakistan, where he said he hopes one day children will look at a picture of his son and say "this is the kind of person I would like to be."

Daniel Pearl's murder has become symbolic for the journalists who place their lives on the line when they cover stories.

"Why do journalists like Daniel Pearl do what they do?" asked Bill Hutchison, a reporter with the Toronto CTV affiliate CFTO.

"They do it because they believe in telling the truth... shining the light on corruption and evil."

Daniel Pearl spent 11 years at the Wall Street Journal, covering stories in hot spots such as Iran and Pakistan.

He was also a talented bluegrass fiddler and mandolin player.

At the time Pearl was killed, his wife, Mariane, was pregnant with the couple's only child, Adam.

To continue Pearl's aspirations, his family and friends set up the Daniel Pearl Foundation to "promote cross-cultural understanding through journalism, music, and innovative communications."

Last October, it held the First Annual Daniel Pearl Music Day, which brought thousands of musicians from nearly 20 countries to locations around the world to "celebrate humanity and take a stand against intolerance."

Summing up, Judea Pearl spoke of the legacy he hopes his son will leave.

"I hope one day I can face my grandson and say 'You see Adam, your father's legacy helped us win this battle [over intolerance].'

It's Nobody's Choice... But Your Own.

Nobody can dictate which funeral chapel a family must use. By law, there are no formal or binding agreements between synagogues, burial societies, cemeteries, and funeral chapels.

Deciding on a funeral chapel is an important family decision. The decision is yours; the choice is clear.

JF&CS launches campaign to find Jewish foster homes

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jewish Family and Child Service has received a one-year Foster Parent Recruitment and Retention grant – offered jointly through the Ontario Association of Children's Aid Societies and the Ontario Ministry of Community, Family and Children's Services and the Children's Aid Foundation – that is enabling it to get its One Shul, Two Homes program off the ground.

The program, which was first introduced last year, is now in the early days of a one-year campaign headed up by consultant Linda Shapiro, foster care recruiter.

"We desperately need Jewish foster parents across the spectrum, from Reconstructionist to frum," said Shapiro, who has already begun to work with half a dozen synagogues in the Toronto area.

The name of the program – One Shul, Two Homes – refers to its goal of finding two new foster homes per congregation, but the campaign is also aimed at increasing awareness of JF&CS, which is accredited as a children's aid society, and of its foster program.

Shapiro can provide synagogues with lists of related activities and speakers. "If someone can't be a foster parent, maybe there's some other way in which they can help."

She is hoping to create "a real buzz around the city" so that people will be talking about the program. "Jewish children need Jewish homes... You can't believe the number of Jews who don't believe there are Jews in need."

Selma Elzas, JF&CS' foster care co-ordinator, said the agency currently has about 35 foster homes, and there are usually about the same number of children in foster care. In addition there are about 60 children using other resources, such as group homes.

Probably the most urgent need in terms of foster homes is placement for teenagers and pre-schoolers, said Elzas. Teenagers' behaviour can be complicated and challenging, especially for parents who have younger children and have not yet raised teens, she said. "Generally, it's a little more daunting for some people."

Qualities that make a good foster parent for a teenager (or children of any age) include clear rules and expectations, a sense of humour, and "a certain relaxed approach," said Elzas. "Kids know exactly where they stand, but don't feel controlled and do feel they have a voice."

Also, she noted, there's no prejudging on the basis of appearance, such as clothes or piercings. "The foster parents I see who are excellent with teens are able to get past all that and look at the kid and see...the powerful strengths that some of the teens have. Sometimes those strengths have not been recognized as much as the problems."

Typical foster stays are 18 months to two years, but short-term foster homes are also needed for emergency and respite care. For example, Elzas mentioned, one foster parent is going to visit family in Israel and her foster child has to go to a respite home temporarily.

"Those types of families are very much needed as well. Sometimes for new foster parents, respite is a good way to introduce them to the program. It's kind of a nice way to move into fostering."

JF&CS also needs foster homes for children with developmental delays and learning disabilities, and could use foster parents who are skilled in those areas, Elzas added. "Our goal is really to build our resources. Sometimes we're inundated [with children to place], and sometimes it's quieter, but we always have to have homes available and ready."

Foster parents can be married or single, and can have children at home or not. Parental training and child-related expenses are provided by JF&CS.

For further information about One Shul, Two Homes, call Linda Shapiro at 416-667-1531. For information about becoming a foster parent, call Selma Elzas at JF&CS, 416-638-7800.

New government, old challenges

One month after the general election, the new government of the 16th Knesset of Israel was sworn in. His party having won more votes than any other, Ariel Sharon won the right to form that government. And last week, on Feb. 27, he presented it to the people of Israel, a governing coalition with 68 of the 120 seats in the Knesset.

Of every government of the 15 Knessets in the preceding 55 years, it could be said it faced turbulent international times, profoundly complex domestic social and economic problems and ever-present issues of national security whose margins for error, separating life from death, seemed never wider than a hair's breadth. Such is the nature of the burden of the responsibility of governing Israel. It is unlike any borne anywhere in the West.

The government sworn in last week carries the same multi-weighted burden as its predecessors:

- Israel's economy is reeling, wounded deeply by the 30 months of violence unleashed against it by the Palestinian leadership. Investment from abroad has essentially stopped; tourism is at a record low; unemployment is at a record high.
- The country's social divisions, in certain respects, are more pronounced, exacerbated by the inability of the economy to provide a supportive structural framework for remedy and repair.
- The conflict with the Palestinians seems no closer to resolution due to the abject refusal of their leadership to reject, without equivocation, violence and terrorism.
- The impending U.S.-led war against Iraq poses potentially ominous "fallout" for the people of Israel.
- Anti-Israel hostility is rife throughout much of the western world, in part derivative of anti-American feelings, but mostly re-nascent in its own right.

Only someone who has not been on this planet these past 2½ years would deny that much of the western media is hostile to Ariel Sharon. One need only look to the hideous and grotesque caricature of him gorging on a young child that appeared recently in the London Independent. It is puzzling, yet illuminating, that even after the link between the Palestinian Authority and the campaign of terror has been proven beyond any doubt, much of the Middle East commentary still offers lame apologetics for the despot Yasser Arafat but sharp criticism for the democratically elected Ariel Sharon.

But Sharon understands well the historic burden of governing the State of Israel. As he eloquently told the Knesset last week: "This has always been the destiny and trademark of our people: to withstand and survive. To confront and overcome. To fight and triumph. To withstand strong tests – human or divine – which no other people has faced, and to emerge strengthened in spirit and deed."

We in the Diaspora have a role to play in helping the people of Israel as they and their government bear the burden.

Belgium's vendetta

Regarding your editorial on Belgium's vendetta directed at Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and Jewish "war criminals," as far as war criminals are concerned, Belgium is one of the few western European nations that has not come clean about its collaboration with the Nazis during World War II (CJN, "Misrule of law, rule of chaos," Feb. 20).

Belgians should be concerned with the home-grown Nazi collaborators that are walking the streets of Brussels, rather than with phantom Jewish "war criminals." They are shifting their guilt (of which they are historically expert) to avoid examination of their pro-Nazi conduct during World War II.

What happened to the Belgium Jewish communities during World War II? Where are the children?

If I were a Jewish student in Belgium, I would feel extremely uncomfortable. Perhaps these students, who are exposed to psychological terrorism (as are Jewish students in Canada), may be able to continue their education in the United States?

Brian Mulroney was right – Israel is the "new Jew" and the Jew is Israel.

George Bernstein
Windsor, Ont.

Mulroney is correct

Former prime minister Brian Mulroney is absolutely correct in identifying Israel as the "new Jew" and the target of anti-Semitism.

Universities throughout the world are refusing to invite Israeli academics to international conferences. There are calls to boycott companies that do business with Israel, and many European countries are cancelling trade agreements with the State of Israel.

To a large degree, the media are responsible for this new hatred of Jews because they portray Palestinian terrorism as morally equivalent to Israel's right to self-defence and retaliation.

The government of Canada is not blameless in that it supports, or, at best, abstains from one-sided United Nations resolutions that portray Israel's (read: Jews') every move as evil and destructive, while describing Palestinians as helpless and frustrated victims.

In its uneven reporting, the CBC, in effect, identifies suicide bombers as martyrs and Israel's attempt to eradicate the killers of innocents as state terrorism.

Even the poisonous rantings of Saskatchewan native leader David Ahenakew, though momentarily condemned, are soon forgiven and he is about to be reinstated as a senator with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations. He has not been prosecuted for his most obvious hate crimes, nor has his membership in the Order of Canada been rescinded.

A day has not passed without some incident fuelling the hatred of Jews and the rise of anti-Semitism in the world.

Bert Raphael
Toronto

Jews or Israelis?

The word "Jew" comes from the first syllable of "Judea," the country or state, and the first syllable of "Judean," referring to the people.

Judea was destroyed as a state by the Romans. Its people were killed, taken prisoner or scattered over the Mediterranean world. The descendants of the Judeans, wherever they lived, called themselves Jews.

But since we now have a Jewish state – called Israel, not Judea – should we still call ourselves Jews, or should we call ourselves Israelis? All Jews can move to Israel at any time, thanks to the Law of Return.

Whatever happens to Israel, good or bad, has a direct effect on our lives, no matter where we live. For Israelis living in Israel, and Jews or Israelis living in the Diaspora, the change in name from Jew to Israeli would reflect a change in attitude. The gulf between Diaspora and Israeli Jews would be bridged.

Disappointed with The CJN

How objective and politically nonpartisan is The CJN in its coverage of Canadian foreign policy towards Israel?

Having missed the panel discussion at Holy Blossom on Feb. 10 due to other commitments, I was looking forward to reading a balanced report.

But in your coverage of the panel (CJN, "Day, Grafstein critical of Liberal policy on Israel," Feb. 20), much more space was given to the opinions of Canadian Alliance MP Stockwell Day and Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein than was given to the views of left-wing Globe and Mail columnist and fellow panelist Rick Salutin. (Never mind the coverage given to Day's views in the weeks prior to the panel.)

Since when is the Jewish community only interested in the perspective of conservatives such as Day or David Frum?

What a disappointment.

Teaching the Zionist Narrative

The problem: A lack of knowledge among teachers

By KENNETH STEIN

After the outbreak of the Palestinian intifadah in September 2000, trips to Israel virtually ceased. Though these trips were acknowledged as a key antidote to creeping assimilation and inter-marriage (along with Jewish day schools and camps), face-to-face contact between North American Jews and Israelis, for the time being at least, were almost fully suspended.

A second slap occurred when negative discussions about Israeli policies increased on North American university campuses. Jewish students were, for the most part, inadequately prepared to answer questions about the origins of Zionism or incapable of defending Israel because they lacked the facts. With or without trips to Israel, we learned that Jewish students did not know their own narrative. How did that happen?

Before Israel's creation, North American Jewish organizations imbibed "Israel" from episodic lectures and symposia, listening to talks a half-hour long or less. For the affiliated, who made up one-third of the North American Jewish population, these were wonderful updates on the matzav (situation), but almost no time was spent in learning the historical context. Later, Israelis and Israeli-born professionals came to camps and Jewish school environments with organized activities and lessons about Israel. Celebrations of Yom Hashoah and Yom Ha'azmaut were important but not done in context.

In the early years of Israel's existence, the small minority of North American Jews who identified with Zionism chose advocacy and philanthropy to support the Jewish state. Unremitting antagonism toward Israel from the Arab world and the Soviet Union kept North American Jewry focused on both. In the 1950s and 1960s, North American Jews adopted Israeli culture, food and songs as part of their Jewish identity.

It was a wonderfully convenient formula for us to continue assimilating while enjoying Israel's culture, supporting Israel financially, making it in America and using Israel as our "religious" icon. We judged our yearly successes by how much more money we raised "card-for-card," a critically important function in saving Jews in danger and need. We learned to use power to gain access to decision-makers, vowing never again to be powerless in the face of dictators or anti-Semites. So we licked more stamps per capita than any other ethnic group and displayed power far beyond our numbers.

As advocacy and philanthropy prevailed, we focused our collective Jewish narrative on victimization and remembering the Holocaust. When Jewish studies programs exploded on university campuses in the 1970s, endowed chairs in Holocaust studies were established, but equal treatment was not given to the study of Zionist/Israeli history. More recently, with Palestinian suicide bombings against Israelis and outbreaks of anti-Semitic acts in Europe, we were reminded that persecution against Jews is not just a drummed-up fear that belongs in the past but is valid in the present.

One of the few places where Zionism and Israel can and should be taught is in Jewish academic settings, such as day schools, congregational schools, adult education programs, camps and in American Jewish organizational settings. And yet, we find from the vast majority of 80 kindergarden to Grade 12 teachers who took week-long intensive learning courses about Israeli society, history and politics at Emory University in June 2000 and 2002 – a small sampling of Jewish school teachers in North America, to be sure – their discomfort in teaching Zionism or Israel does not come from disinterest, far from it, but from a lack of knowledge about the very Zionist/Israeli narrative they would be expected to teach. These highly dedicated teachers also suggested that severe time constraints limit the amount of time available to teach Zionism and Israeli topics.

Knowing Zionist history does not negate the importance of philanthropy nor does it diminish the critical nature of advocacy. By not knowing our own narrative, our points of debate are someone else's. Voila, Jewish students are on the defensive.

When trips start again, teaching and knowing the narrative will make connections deeper and more meaningful. When we were not an emancipated people, we had time for learning. Knowing the narrative might stem assimilation. Knowledge is empowerment. "Card-for-card" UJA increases are splendid, but so are annual double-digit increases in knowledge per person.

On our doorposts in the mezuzah is written, "Teach them diligently unto the children." Well, we have not done a very good job.

One solution: 'Teaching that never became sentimental or self-absorbed'

By ALEX POMSON

In recent years, there have been two surprising success stories in Jewish education. The more radical success, energized by the launch of Birthright Israel, has been the expansion of Israel experience programs. In the last four years, more than 30,000 young adults have travelled to Israel on Birthright Israel-funded educational tours. The less dramatic success, but at least as significant, is the opening of some 75 Jewish day schools in North America in the last decade, which cater to a student population that has more than doubled to 210,000 in 20 years.

These two trends have developed in essentially separate universes. Birthright Israel is aimed at the marginally affiliated, to whom it offers, free of charge, an intense and potentially transformative 10-day trip to Israel. The program asks only that participants be Jewish. In contrast, day school education calls for deep and sustained commitment from its clients who, in most cases, pay between $8,000 and $20,000 a year. It does not promise quick results, but offers instead the steady enhancement of Jewish knowledge and identity over many years.

The differences between day schools and Israel programs reflect a long-standing dichotomy between "formal" and "informal" Jewish education. These labels come with a variety of expectations: that formal education takes place in schools, while informal education occurs in camps, community centres and Israel trips; that formal education involves teaching young people Jewish knowledge and skills, while informal education involves providing them with Jewish experiences; that formal education is delivered by certified teachers who draw on professional preparation, while informal education is purveyed by madrichim (youth leaders) who rely more on intuition and passion than on curriculum.

The Jewish Teacher Education Program at York University and Canada Israel Experience (CIE), a department of UIA Federations Canada, have recently joined to develop a cadre of personnel who are comfortable in both formal and informal educational settings. York's program is the largest non-denominational university program that prepares day school teachers in North America. CIE provides Israel Experience programming for Canadian Jewish young adults. Together they have launched an initiative to educate professionals who think of themselves as Jewish educators rather than teachers or madrichim.

The semester-long program for Jewish teacher education students climaxed in a recent eight-day, field-study trip to Israel for 20 York students, who also participated in a Birthright Israel trip as observers.

The author, standing second from left, and a group of prospective teachers in Jerusalem.

I am somewhat jaded from my longstanding involvement in Israel programs, but this trip left me exhilarated and inspired.

First of all, at a time when many people are staying away from Israel, one has to be encouraged that this group, consisting of almost every senior student in York's Jewish teacher education program, showed no equivocation about being there. Indeed, the students showed a deep commitment to Israel and Israeli society that, I am convinced, they will in time communicate to their own students.

Secondly, one could not but be inspired by the program itself. During their stay in Israel, the students visited a number of sites, including the Kotel tunnels in Jerusalem, ancient Caesarea and Neve Tzedek in Tel Aviv. They did not experience these places only as tourists. With the help of a guide, they learned how a historical site can become an educational text. For future teachers who might imagine that only written texts invite layers of interpretation and engagement, these visits demonstrated how diverse sources of learning can be.

For two days, the students teamed up with a group of Israeli army educators to compare thoughts on a variety of themes. They also met, studied and argued with some of Israel's outstanding informal Jewish educators. These sessions revealed how far Jewish educators in Israel have gone in developing new conceptions of Israel's relationship to world Jewry through new programs, moving beyond the old clichés about what Israel is and can be. Some people in the group were challenged by these new notions because they did not reproduce the unambiguous ideas upon which they had been raised. For many, though, these sessions indicated a sophistication that will enable Israel to speak to the hearts and minds of an increasingly diverse Jewish world.

I found the trip's most educational moment came not from a site visit or workshop, but from a meeting with Danny Sanderson, one of Israel's most beloved pop stars, who has not only shaped contemporary Israeli culture, but has reflected on much of what has happened in Israel since the Yom Kippur War through his songs.

Through music and conversation, Sanderson unobtrusively taught us about Israel's concerns, the special character of the Hebrew language and Israel's relationship with other countries. This was Jewish education at its most sophisticated: teaching that never became sentimental or self-absorbed. For future Jewish educators, it was a master class in teaching and learning. It was as authentic an encounter between Israel and the Diaspora as one could ever imagine.

The best food on Earth

OK, I admit it; at times, I critique the food at simchahs.

Yet, despite my own failings, I'm uncomfortable when I hear people play food critic at simchahs.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

It bothers me because the purpose of attending a simchah is not to enjoy an evening of fine dining, but rather to celebrate the bar mitzvah or wedding.

Complaining about the meal at a wedding is like going to a baseball game and complaining about the hot dogs: if you're a fan, the food doesn't matter, and if you're not a fan, you shouldn't be there.

Even worse, at times the critical comments about the salmon appetizer make their way to the family and cause them distress. Instead of celebrating with the joyous family, the erstwhile food critic causes them aggravation.

But what drives us to search for the world's tastiest piece of salmon?

Personally, I blame Martha Stewart. Not Martha directly (she's had enough problems recently), but I do blame the Martha Stewart mindset, the attitude that everything must be elegant and tasteful.

Of course, there's nothing wrong with pursuing the perfect meal or home. Life is short, and in our brief time here, we should enjoy God's good earth. As the Talmud says, "grab and eat, grab and drink, for this world we will leave is like a banquet."

But here's the problem. As we learn the nuances of fine culinary art, we also become discriminating snobs.

Appreciating the best life has to offer can cause us to consider everything else inferior and disappointing. So a perfectly good piece of salmon becomes an affront to the gourmand's tastebuds, and instead of toasting the joy of the new couple, we discuss the inept appetizer.

Indeed, the irony of learning how to "appreciate" fine food is that, in the process, we lose a genuine appreciation of food. An overcooked, underseasoned piece of chicken is remarkably tasty. We've just turned off our tastebuds, expecting better, because our gourmet quest has caused us to lose perspective.

One of my mother's favourite sayings is "hunger is the best cook". She says that the army rations she ate right after being liberated from Auschwitz was the best meal she ever ate in her life, one that even the best chefs could never re-create. The overwhelming hunger she experienced at the time brought out the best in that bland meal. What she learned then was that with the right outlook, any piece of food can be enormously tasty.

Ultimately, flavour depends on perspective. And to me, the food at simchahs, even if it's unworthy of five stars in the Michelin guide, is the best food on earth.

An Israeli's appeal to Palestinians

Yitzhak Frankenthal is known among Israelis and Palestinians as an indefatigable – if controversial – advocate for peace. After his soldier son, Arik, was kidnapped and murdered by Hamas in 1994, Frankenthal, together with several Israeli and Palestinian bereaved parents, established the Bereaved Families Forum for Peace. (In the last six months, more than 100,000 Israelis and Palestinians have called in to the forum's "Hello Salaam" toll-free line to talk with one another.)

Shira Herzog in Toronto

Last month, Frankenthal's torment over the current impasse led him to write an open letter to the Palestinian people. It was an unusual step, even for a committed Israeli peacenik. But even more interesting than the letter is the response it got. Two leading Palestinian dailies, Al Quds and Al Ayam, published the entire letter in Arabic and the alternative Palestinian media Web site, amin.org, gave it even broader exposure. (Amin.org also publishes articles that have been censored or refused publication in established Palestinian outlets.)

Frankenthal's letter reflects the deep frustration of many Israelis who believe that an agreement with the Palestinians is essential for Israel's future, but who can see no way out unless the Palestinians deal effectively with their own extremist voices. His provocative statements are equally challenging for Israeli and Palestinian readers. The following are excerpts:

"I will continue fighting against the occupation, as for me it opposes human morality. Occupation causes terrible injustice, occupation is ruining Israeli society. But, in order to create change in Israel, there is need of a big and strong peace camp. The Israeli peace camp is currently in shreds because of the terror that struck the Israeli population.

"I have reached the conclusion that I must turn to you, for the simple reason that the right path is not seeking justice, but being wise. The Israeli public is very angry, because you hurt it: in coffee shops, buses, hurting the children and the citizens.

"I know that many of you that read my words will ask: 'Why is Frankenthal turning to us? Why does he not fight to stop the occupation and then the terror attacks will also stop?' And there are those who will say, 'We must continue terror attacks in Israel, for this is the only language the Israelis understand.' This is a big mistake. See for yourselves how much terror you have carried out in the past two years and achieved the opposite result.

"There may be those among you who would like to change things and it is to you that I turn: my enemies today, neighbours in the future.

"You need today, more than ever, to begin self-examination… I say this as someone who respects you and is interested in your benefit, and especially as a religious Israeli and a Zionist patriot. Without the support of the Israeli public you will not obtain a Palestinian state, and continue suffering the disgrace of hunger and suppression.

"You must do everything in your power to convince your brothers that shedding the blood of Israelis will not bring you independence and will not bring you relief… The first step must come from you, not because we as Israelis are right, but because if you desire independence, it is for you to bring the Israeli peace camp to start acting again. I urge you, do not find justice, and find the wisdom."

Frankenthal's comments may be cynically dismissed as a naive, desperate attempt to resurrect the failed position of the Israeli peace camp. But if the last two years have proven anything, it is that the views of the old hawks and doves are both irrelevant.

The relevant question now is less about what Israel should or should not do to the Palestinians, and more about the shape of its own future. If Israel indeed has no choice but to remain where it is in the West Bank and Gaza, what are the consequences for the country and people? As a committed Israeli, Frankenthal fears the implications of that scenario. He is appealing directly to the Palestinians because without them, the situation cannot change for either side. And there are small but perceptible signs that more Palestinians are listening.

(Go to Amin.org for the full text of Frankenthal's letter and for another perspective on the internal Palestinian debate.)

From dissent to desertion

In early February, a fifth year rabbinical student at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary, Jill Jacobs, had her Torah commentary rejected by the weekly student newsletter. The action was taken by a seminary administrator and prompted the resignation of the student editor.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

The reason? Her commentary included criticisms of Israeli government policies. And according to JTS administrators, that criticism might have led the Israeli tourism ministry to stop subsidizing JTS student missions to Israel. Another implied fear was that strongly pro-Israel donors might cut back on gifts.

This seems like a troubling example of heavy-handed censorship within the community and a stifling of dissenting views and important debate.

But what I find equally surprising are the actual views expressed by Jacobs in a Feb. 21 article on the case published by the Forward.

Jacobs opposes the occupation of the West Bank and Gaza and would like it to end. Fair enough. So do I. But she also opposes what she calls "military operations" – a term she uses twice – in the territories. Here she is aligned with a very small slice of Israeli public opinion that supports Israeli soldiers who refuse to serve in the territories.

Of course, there are many forms of military operations. One type consists of intercepting suicide bombers, pursuing armed terrorists or destroying munitions factories. Another might be enforcing curfews and checkpoints. And yet another might be blowing up the homes of terrorists' families and causing unforeseen injuries or deaths to bystanders. These are not morally equivalent, but Jacobs makes no distinctions.

Until an orderly evacuation of the territories and the conclusion of an agreement between Israel and the Palestinians, some military operations may be required.

Jacobs says "dozens" of JTS students have come forward to support her, registering their own "ambivalence" about Israel. Some of these rabbinical students are allegedly re-thinking spending a year of study in Israel as part of their training because the Israeli "government has been party to human rights abuses." She says the events of "the last three years" (a time frame which long predates the election of Ariel Sharon as prime minister), as well as recent revisionist writings by critical Israelis on the origin of the conflict, weaken her unconditional support of Israel.

The tone and substance of her column seem to go far beyond criticism of certain policies. It is surprising that this degree of re-examination of the tie to Israel should be rampant within the ranks of the future Conservative rabbinate. The Conservative movement is not Reform, Reconstructionist, or Jewish Renewal, which are all noteworthy for their left-of-centre politics on domestic and Israel-related issues.

Supporters of Israel must hope that this new ambivalence is really limited to policy disputes and not indicative of something deeper.

Here is the problem. In the first two decades of its existence, Israel was the darling of progressives and leftists. Political sympathies started to change after the Six Day War, as Palestinians came to be seen as underdogs.

At the same time, the demographic composition of the country began to change. The dominant role of the Labor party, the kibbutzim and the Histadrut began to erode. Large numbers of Sephardi Jews, haredim and non-liberal Russian immigrants changed the social and political culture of the country.

As Likud and other religious, ethnic or conservative parties gained in popularity, Israel became less appealing to the sorts of liberal North American Jews likely to opt for the Conservative rabbinate. Indeed for many liberal Israelis and North American Jews, even Jerusalem no longer holds the same attractions, given perceptions about the increasing religiosity of the city.

The demographics will likely not be reversed in the near future. Since Israel is a democracy, the government and its policies may increasingly come to reflect the wishes of these new Israeli voters, and not those of liberal North Americans. The cultural and political divide may grow. There will likely be increasing levels of discomfort, as well as more intensive debate within North American Jewry and between North American (liberal) Jews and Israel.

No country, including Israel, deserves unconditional support. In my view, the seminary was wrong to censor Jacobs' commentary. But the real story here is the possible shift in bedrock support for Israel in the next generation of the North American rabbinate.

Peace is the answer to Israel's economic malaise

When Bill Clinton was campaigning against George Bush in his first run for the U.S. presidency a decade ago, he focused on concrete economic issues, the weak chink in the incumbent president's armour. "It's the economy, stupid," one of Clinton's attack ads shrilly proclaimed.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Pulling a leaf out of Clinton's playbook, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon, who marks two years in office and celebrates his 75th birthday this week, is taking his canny statement to heart.

Sharon, who formed a new government last week after winning his second consecutive election on Jan. 28, has come to the sobering realization that he cannot fix Israel's sputtering economy unless he deals constructively and conclusively with the festering Palestinian issue. As he explained last November:

"I want to arrive at an arrangement with the Palestinians because that will be the only solution to Israel's ailing economy. A diplomatic agreement that brings peace is the real answer to the economic situation."

Sharon reiterated this assertion last week – knowing full well that, as Martin Indyk, the former American ambassador to Israel, said, the status quo is no longer tenable. Any doubts Sharon may have had about this reality were dispelled recently by Ya'akov Frenkel, the former governor of the Bank of Israel. He observed: "Without progress on the diplomatic front, there is no chance at all of rescuing Israel's economy…"

Under Sharon's watch, the economy has experienced negative growth and slid into a deep recession. The unemployment rate has cracked the double-digit mark. Wages and private consumption have declined as the standard of living has fallen and per capita production has dropped. Foreign investment is sharply down. The shekel is weaker.

By contrast, during the highwater mark of the Oslo peace process in the mid-1990s, the economy was thriving and the future looked reasonably bright.

The fiscal mess Israel finds itself in today cannot be pinned entirely on Sharon. Israel, after all, is partially at the mercy of external economic factors. Sharon, nevertheless, is in a position to exert some control. If he can defuse the current Palestinian uprising, the partial cause of Israel's current economic ills, and bring a measure of peace, he stands a good chance of turning the situation around.

In the absence of such conditions, Sharon is trying to jumpstart the economy by other means: Israel has submitted a request for $12 billion in American assistance – $4 billion in direct aid and $8 billion in loan guarantees.

Washington is considering the proposal, but President George W. Bush may withhold the money if Israel is perceived as dragging its feet on the peace process.

Sharon's predicament is one in which his Likud predecessor, Yitzhak Shamir, found himself after he asked for $10 billion in U.S. loan guarantees. Shamir, an opponent of the land-for-peace formula, was rebuffed due to his insistence on building settlements in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip and maintaining Israel's grip on the territories.

Israel received these funds only after Yitzhak Rabin defeated Shamir in the 1992 election. Rabin, though no dove, drew a sharp distinction between "political" and "security" settlements, and that was enough for the United States. Even so, Washington deducted one dollar for every dollar Rabin spent on building or expanding settlements.

More than 10 years on, the conventional wisdom is that Israel will forfeit $12 billion in additional aid unless Sharon accepts the "road map," the Mideast peace plan sponsored by the so-called Quartet (the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations).

Based on Bush's June 24, 2002 proposals and on former U.S. senator George Mitchell's ideas, the road map was presented for consideration to Israel and the Palestinians last December, and has since been refined.

It consists of three interlocking phases, beginning with a mutual ceasefire, an Israeli withdrawal to the pre-intifadah lines, a freeze in Israeli settlement activities and the wholesale reform of the Palestinian Authority (PA). If these benchmarks are met, the Palestinians will be entitled to provisional statehood this year. And if a permanent agreement can be reached by 2005, the Palestinians will have a full-fledged state.

PA President Yasser Arafat has reportedly embraced the road map. Sharon, who last September officially declared the Oslo process dead, has accepted it in principle, but with serious reservations.

Sharon's critique of the road map is multifaceted. He has complained that Israel is required to take " irreversible steps" without any real reciprocity from the other side. He seems not to have internalized the pressing need for a total settlement freeze.

As a powerful minister in previous Likud governments, he allocated colossal sums for the construction of settlements, which the United States regards as an obstacle to peace. Sharon, therefore, is none to eager to dismantle them. "Netzarim," he declared, referring to a settlement in Gaza, "is no different from Negba, Yad Mordechai or Tel Aviv."

When he was foreign minister in Benjamin Netanyahu's government, Sharon urged Jewish settlers to seize empty West Bank hilltops. The unsolicited advice touched off a scramble, resulting in the establishment of more than 100 unauthorized outposts, most of which still remain in place. Sharon also objects to evacuating isolated settlements that, strategically, are of no value to Israel.

Ariel Sharon

During Sharon's recent talks with Amram Mitzna over the possibility of the Labor party joining a national unity government, he raised the Netzarim/Tel Aviv equation yet again. This set off alarm bells in Mitzna's mind. And when Sharon apparently refused to sign a document promising to relinquish settlements and outposts, Mitzna knew he could not sit in the same cabinet as Sharon.

Settlements, however, are not the only problem Sharon has with the Quartet's road map. Sharon is demanding more than 100 changes so that it conforms much more closely to Bush's June 24 speech, which Sharon hailed in glowing terms. Within the context of an eventual two-state solution, Bush called for a new Palestinian leadership "not compromised by terror" and demanded sweeping reforms in the PA.

Sharon's fundamental objections to the road map relate to security, Palestinian reforms, timing and Palestinian sovereignty.

The final point is pregnant with significance. The road map endows a provisional Palestinian state with "characteristics of sovereignty," but Sharon insists on severe limitations: A Palestinian state should be demilitarized, forbidden to form alliances with Israel's enemies and allow Israel to control all entrances, exits and air space.

Even then, it is not quite clear whether Sharon would acquiesce to a Palestinian state. Last June, he railed against the concept. But then he suggested that a Palestinian state already exists in the Palestinian autonomous areas, which Israel occupied last June after a spate of Palestinian suicide bombings. At the Third Herzliyah Conference last December, he softened his position. "Israel will allow the establishment of a Palestinian state with temporary borders," he disclosed, saying it could be formed on 42 per cent of the West Bank, "except for areas vital for security." He did not elaborate.

Before laying down these stringent guidelines, Sharon's aides told the Jerusalem Report that he was prepared to hand over to the Palestinians 49 per cent of the West Bank – with its non-contiguous bits and pieces of territory connected by a system of roads, bridges and tunnels – and two-thirds of Gaza.

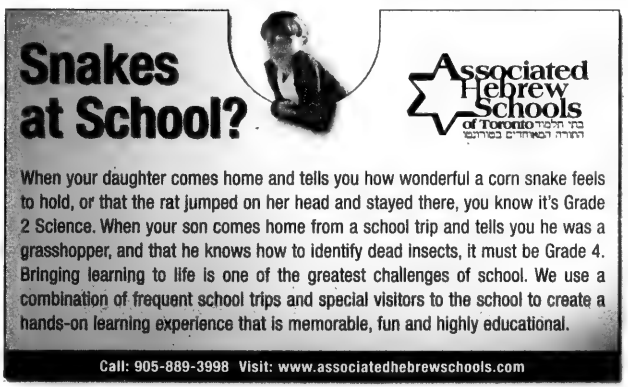
Can this plan fly? Probably not.

Sharon's Likud party formally opposes an independent Palestinian state, as do his newest coalition partners, the National Religious Party and the National Union, both of which champion settlements in the West Bank and Gaza. And given the fact that Arafat rejected Ehud Barak's 2000 Camp David offer of a Palestinian state in about 90 per cent of the West Bank and all of Gaza, what can he be expected to make of Sharon's far less generous offer? The answer is quite obvious.

Sharon claims that he is ready to make "painful concessions" for the sake of achieving a political breakthrough with the Palestinians. But when Mitzna put him to the test most recently, he was found wanting. As a result, Mitzna pulled out of talks about Labor party participation in a unity government.

In his heart of hearts, Sharon wants peace, if only to re-energize Israel's faltering economy. But is he really ready to take the hard, agonizing steps that a genuine rapprochement with the Palestinians requires? Or is he simply playing for time, as Shamir was, and hoping he can ride out the pressure the United States will surely exert on Israel after a war in Iraq?

As Bush said in a major speech on Feb. 26, the United States is committed to the road map and a viable, democratic Palestinian state. The message from Washington is loud and clear.



Snakes at School?
Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto
When your daughter comes home and tells you how wonderful a corn snake feels to hold, or that the rat jumped on her head and stayed there, you know it's Grade 2 Science. When your son comes home from a school trip and tells you he was a grasshopper, and that he knows how to identify dead insects, it must be Grade 4. Bringing learning to life is one of the greatest challenges of school. We use a combination of frequent school trips and special visitors to the school to create a hands-on learning experience that is memorable, fun and highly educational.

Examining the pro-Israeli grassroots community

By DARCIE RICHLER

The pro-Israel grassroots movement is currently fighting a new kind of war in Canada. This war, while not generally characterized by physical violence (at least not yet), is one with potentially huge casualties in terms of public opinion. Many supporters of Israel have already found their niche in this struggle by engaging parliamentarians, scrutinizing local newspapers for bias against Israel and educating the public. Many of them are working with the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) in an effort to counter the anti-Israel assault.

The purpose of this new column is to examine from the CIC's perspective some of the challenges that the pro-Israel grassroots community faces in this battle. It is hoped that readers will gain a broader understanding of the issues and learn how to promote the pro-Israel agenda. Expect to see future columns on specific responses commonly used to combat anti-Israel rhetoric and on new CIC initiatives or other new intiatives that have come to the CIC's attention. There will also be special attention given to the increasingly serious issues facing university campuses across the country.

The CIC, a partnership of all national organizations and the federated communities across Canada, is mandated to act on behalf of the organized Jewish community on all matters relating to Canada-Israel bilateral affairs and Canadian Middle East policy. While it is primarily focused on Canada's political and media sectors, CIC was asked to expand its activities in response to the challenges in Israel that have emerged since the Palestinian terrorism campaign began September 2000. The organization was asked to develop a community outreach program, train grassroots advocates and develop a network across Canada to complement its lobbying activities. This program is being carried out by the CIC's community development department.

At this stage, the department's efforts are directed through a variety of workshops and training sessions where groups of people come together to form what is called a Local Israel Action Team (LIAT). Initially, LIAT members learn the "how-to" basics on Israel advocacy, and ultimately, they choose the method and area in which they can most successfully take on the advocacy challenge.

There are currently more than 75 LIAT groups across Canada, all of whom are connected through an electronic network to keep up-to-date on the latest projects. While the CIC serves as a resource and helps facilitate and mobilize groups to get the best results, each LIAT functions as a separate entity.

Many people not currently involved with pro-Israel advocacy find the prospect of promoting Israel somewhat intimidating. Others feel they are not sufficiently knowledgeable to do so. However, one need not know "everything" to become a successful advocate for Israel. The public relations challenge is being fought through promotion of the pro-Israel agenda, which is something that can be learned easily. The CIC believes that advocates should promote, not defend. The success of each LIAT is based upon the idea that pro-active advocacy is much more potent than reactive defence.

The LIAT program reveals that many Jews think they have to be "defenders" of Israel in order to respond to anti-Israel rhetoric. However, the field results from this program have demonstrated the effectiveness of positive promotion and advancement of the pro-Israel agenda.

The pro-Israel community is vital and strong at the same time as Israel's right to exist is constantly being challenged and de-legitimized by the anti-Israel lobby. In addition to serving as a forum for those already "in the trenches," this column is intended to encourage readers to get involved in Israel advocacy; now, more than ever, the need for supporters of Israel to come forward is urgent.

If you are interested in attending or organizing a LIAT workshop, please e-mail me at dr@cicweb.ca for further information, or visit www.cicweb.ca.

Even Esther Understood

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

The holiday of Purim speaks meaningfully to the Jewish people: the political intrigue, the royal court, the Jewish queen and her savvy uncle, the saga of the Jewish people trying desperately to find some sense in a world of exile, a world gone topsy-turvy. If only it didn't speak quite so meaningfully to the Jewish people.

One of the primary themes of the story of Purim is the theme of hidden elements. Certainly, God is not mentioned in any overt way, for the Divine manifestation has become hidden. There is the hidden plot of the two royal officers to assassinate King Achashverosh, and even Esther hides her identity as she functions within the royal palace.

Yet we do not easily accept this hidden world since resolution occurs only when what is hidden becomes revealed. Mordecai informs of the hidden assassination plot and Esther must reveal her true identity in order to save her people.

The rabbis in the Talmud refer to Esther's hidden identity as her way of obeying Mordecai, who instructed her to be silent. In fact, Esther's silence is attributed to her long family history of silence. Rachel, Esther's ancestral matriarch, was silent when Jacob married her sister Leah. The midrash states that Benjamin, Esther's tribal ancestor, was aware of the sale of Joseph, his brother, but chose to remain silent. Esther comes by her silence quite honestly.

But after three days of fasting and confronting serious identity questions, Esther understands that she must break her silence if she and her people are to survive. She carefully crafts a plan, choosing a moment to reveal to the king that she is Jewish and is being persecuted.

The Talmud makes an interesting comparison between Achashverosh and Pharaoh, the king of Egypt. The Jewish people proclaim through a prayer their thanks to God for saving them from the rule of Pharaoh, but no such prayer is said at Purim. The Talmud states that although the Jews were saved from Pharaoh, we are still all under the reign of Achashverosh. Whether it is ancient Persia, the Talmudic era or the modern world, the realities of exile do not change.

In today's world, there are those who speak publicly with the sentiments of Haman. Under the guise of political debate, the state of Israel has come under attack. With this door opened, anti-Semitism has found a new expression and Jews have been accused of a wide range of atrocities. Native leader David Ahenakew even lamented publicly that Adolf Hitler had not succeeded in exterminating more Jews.

On some university campuses, Jewish students find themselves living the life of Esther. They feel isolated and alone in a world they thought they knew. Some have chosen Esther's initial response, to remain silent. But even Esther understood that only a public stance can secure the situation.

Ultimately, the lesson is learned best from the Talmud. Everything within Judaism has an angel assigned to it. The angel who watches over the dead is named Dumah – silence.

Jewish Life

Purim around the world

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"King Achashverosh was Finnish with his disobedient wife Vashti. 'You Congo now!' he ordered her. After she had Ghana way, the king's messengers went Roman the land to find a new queen. And India end, the beautiful Esther won the crown…"

Think you know everything about Purim? Think again.

As Judaism's happiest holiday, we are familiar with the graggers, the masquerades and the hamantaschen. But how about holiday snowmen, or human-shaped cakes? These are just some of the Purim traditions you can see on the Internet. (Don't worry. We'll get back to the worldly retelling of the Purim story that led off this column.)

The best place to start for global Purim traditions is the Jewish Agency's education department [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/purim/pugnen07.html]. In Germany on Purim eve, torches containing gunpowder would be ignited. During the Megillah reading, the gunpowder exploded with a deafening noise. In Italy, youngsters would divide into two camps and throw nuts at each other. In wintry Bukhara, a large "snow-Haman" was built near the synagogue. After the meal, a bonfire was built and everyone gathered to sing while "Haman" melted.

The Virtual Jerusalem Purim site has also done a great job rounding up some traditions. [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/purim/worldcus.htm] In Cairo revellers would take to the streets in costumes riding donkeys who were dyed in stripes and patterns. Lithuania would see yeshiva students dress up as rabbis, deliver outrageous speeches and gently mock their teachers. In Yemen, grooms would compete at the local Jewish court for the honour of buying the oil and wax used to light the synagogue during the Megillah reading.

And what about where it all started? In Persia, a wealthy man would host a huge Purim feast in his home for the whole community. During the meal, all would march out to watch an effigy of Haman being burned, while shouting, "May the memory of Amalek be erased!" As the fire went out, children took turns jumping over the coals, as they did during celebrations in Talmudic times.

One of the most fascinating holiday customs is creating "Special Purims." According to the Jewish Agency's Jewish Education and Culture page, "Purim serves not only as remembrance of the salvation of Israel in the days of Mordechai and Esther, but is also a symbol of like cases throughout Jewish history in the Diaspora, when the Jews were saved from the 'Hamans' of their generation." [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/purim/pugnen06.html]

Ninety special Purims have been created, such as the "Winz Purim" celebrated by the Jews of Frankfort-on-Main. In the 17th century, Winz Fettmilch whipped up a pogrom against the community. Miraculously, the Jews were saved from destruction, Winz was punished, and Jews celebrated their deliverance from their local Haman. [http://www.us-israel.org/jsource/vjw/frankfurt.html].

Where can you find 250,000 Israelis, and all they are demonstrating is joy? The "Adloyada" is a traditional carnival that has regained popularity in Israel. The name comes from the phrase "And you should drink until you don't know [ad lo yada] the difference between 'Cursed is Haman, Blessed is Mordechai.'" [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/purim/carnival.htm]

A few years ago, revellers jammed downtown Tel Aviv to watch Mayor Ronni Milo, dressed as city's first mayor, Meir Dizengoff, lead the parade on a reluctant white horse. [http://www.jpost.com/com/Archive/13.Mar.1998/News/Article-1.html]

Behind him were huge effigies of then premier Benjamin Netanyahu, Labor leader Ehud Barak, Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and Milo himself. View photographs of Adloyada celebrations at the Hebrew-language Galim site. [http://galim.org.il/purim/ade3.html]

And then there's "The World Famous Story of Purim." Here's how it ends – as if you didn't know. (It's best read aloud.) [http://www.purim.com/jokes.shtml]

"Haman and his 10 sons were hanged and went immediately to the Netherlands. And to Sweden the deal, the Jews were allowed to Polish off the rest of their foes as well. 'You lost your enemies and Uganda friend,' the king smiled. And that is why the Purim story Israeli a miracle. God decided to China fight on His chosen people. So now, let's celebrate! Forget all your Syria's business and just be happy! Serb up some wine and Taiwan on!"

Happy Purim!

Accounting for our gifts

By RABBI MARTIN J. BERMAN

This week's Parshah, Pekudei, begins with the phrase, "Eileh pikudei hamishkan" – these are the reckonings of the mishkan, the tabernacle. The rabbis recognized that this accounting of the materials used in making the mishkan interrupts the flow of the narrative. Why does it appear here? they asked. The Torah must be conveying something important to us. What can we glean from this passage?

In his commentary on the Tur Shulchan Aruch, Rabbi Joel Sirkes, known as the B'ach from his work Bayit Chadash, wrote: "From here (we derive) that while in regard to the kosher gabbai tzedakah (charity collectors), we don't check up after them. Nonetheless, it is good for them to give an accounting, as we find with Moses our teacher that he gave an accounting of all the gifts used in the mishkan, as it says: 'These are the reckonings of the Tabernacle.'"

Rabbi Sirkes suggests that while there is no reason to have accountants go over the books when charity collectors are fine upstanding people, nonetheless, it is a good idea. If Moses felt compelled to do so – and who would suggest that he wasn't an honest agent? – then us lesser mortals should be careful to make it clear that we are acting honestly. Having someone else go over the books does not mean that suspicions surround the collectors. It is just sound policy.

Reb Moshe Feinstein points out another lesson we can learn from the accounting of the mishkan's materials: "The placement of this digression teaches us an important lesson: in order for such material substances as silver and gold to be elevated through use in the construction of a dwelling for HaShem's presence in the people's midst, they had to be dedicated totally to holy purposes. If any of them were diverted to profane uses, none of the structure could be considered holy."

I believe that this lesson means an item becomes holy only when it is used for a holy purpose. Gold and silver are nice, but when they remain used for our everyday lives, they are not holy. But when gold and silver are used in the service of God, they become holy. That is no keen insight on my part, but we should understand that the world is made holy by what we do. One minute, gold is a beautiful item of adornment. The next, it is part of the Tabernacle. What makes it holy? Our dedication of it to the service of God.

It has been suggested that while most other religions sanctify space, Judaism sanctifies time. Just as we sanctify our possessions, we can sanctify time. When we dedicate a period of time, we turn it into something holy.

The most important example of dedicating time is the 25 hours from Friday night until after dark on Saturday night that we call Shabbat. If we dedicate these hours of Saturday to God and Torah, then it is no longer Saturday, but Shabbat. We have made that time holy by our dedication.

Whatever we have, be it material blessings or our time, when we use them in the service of God, they become holy.

BAYT gets award for donating ambulance

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA) last week presented Beth Avraham Yoseph Congregation of Toronto (BAYT) with its Pikuach Nefesh Award for the shul's donation of two intensive care ambulances.

The presentation was made at the synagogue's annual meeting.

Concerned about the situation in Israel and wanting to do something concrete to help, the synagogue's Israel action committee last spring proposed the purchase of an ambulance.

On the second day of Shavuot, Rabbi Baruch Taub, the synagogue's spiritual leader, made an impassioned appeal for funds for the project.

While the intention was to purchase a regular ambulance, when the congregation raised more than $114,000, it became possible to purchase a mobile intensive care unit.

This ambulance has been dedicated to the memory of the late Rebbitzen Judy Taub, the wife of BAYT spiritual leader Rabbi Baruch Taub. The rebbitzen died a 1½ years ago.

Funds were raised not only from members' donations, but also from bar and bat mitzvah gifts and other offerings from the youth of the congregation.

The funds for the second intensive care ambulance came from Sidney Wolbrom, who is not a member of BAYT. Wolbrom said he came to daven on Shavuot and was so moved by Rabbi Taub's speech that after the holiday, he went to the shul office and made the donation.

Sylvia Walt, president of the Toronto chapter of CMDA, said at the presentation that the donation of the vehicles is a desperately needed show of solidarity with Israel.

Shabbat Across Canada set for Saturday

On Friday March 7, thousands of Jews across the United States and Canada will come together at more than 700 locations to celebrate Shabbat.

The Shabbat Across America/Canada program, now in its seventh year, is designed by the New York-based National Jewish Outreach Program (NJOP) to introduce unaffiliated Jews and those with a limited Jewish background to "the joys and beauty of the Jewish Sabbath."

Since 1996, Shabbat Across America has reached 430,000 Jews in more than 1,500 synagogues of all denominations. It features a beginner-level service, a delicious meal, singing, discussion and debate.

This year, NJOP has created new programming materials that focus on two songs traditionally sung prior to the Friday evening meal. One taps into the quest for spiritual elevation and sheds light on the Jewish perspective on angels, while the other is an optional study program that gives participants an opportunity to learn about 19 women from the Bible.

The program is being conducted in Canada at nearly 20 locations throughout Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, including these locations:

- London Jewish Federation, London;
- Solel Congregation, Mississauga;
- Or Hadash Congregation, Newmarket;
- Jewish Campus Services, North York;
- Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, North York;
- Shaarei-Beth El Congregation, Oakville;
- The Richmond Hill Country Shul, Richmond Hill;
- Shaar Shalom Synagogue, Thornhill;
- Vancouver Hillel Foundation, Vancouver;
- Shaarey Tefilah, Vancouver; and
- Beth Shalom, Kelowna.

"Since Sept. 11, we've seen increased participation in all our programs," says Rabbi Ephraim Buchwald, NJOP's founder and director.

Founded in 1987, NJOP is one of the largest and Jewish outreach organizations in the world. Among its other programs are free crash courses in Hebrew reading and basic Judaism, as well as beginner services at 3,580 locations across North America. For more information, visit www.njop.org.

Media Action Group lends support to Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Shirley Anne Haber, Jewish Women International of Toronto's 2003 woman of the year, believes in walking the talk.

As head of Media Action Group (sahaber@sympatico.ca), she sends out information on current events in Israel to about 1,400 people on her e-mail list, and also helps them to effectively challenge the media and the government on critical issues affecting Israel.

Haber, 64, a retired teacher and a founding member of Beth Tikvah Synagogue, started the group more than two years ago after attending a talk at the shul about how the Internet can be used as a vehicle for advocacy.

The group's focus, she said in an interview, is to counter bias in the media, and to support Israel.

"The media is in the entertainment business. They're interested in ratings. They have bias and a frame of reference, and we don't hear objective news.

"In Israel's case, it is perceived as the Goliath, and the Palestinians are presented as the oppressed victim," she said.

She has been to Israel four times in the past two years and encourages others to go. "I believe in supporting the country emotionally, socially and economically."

She started the list with 15 names, she said, and "every time I went to shul I would memorize four or five e-mail addresses. The group grew through word of mouth. Wherever I went, I would tell people about it."

Members come from across the religious spectrum, as well as from across Canada and other countries such as the United States, South Africa, New Zealand, the United Kingdom and Israel.

"We represent Canada, and it is important to have people on the list from across the country, so we're not concentrated in one place."

Her philosophy is to be educational. "We send out information that supports Israel but does not take a position. We're not radical."

She receives her information from a number of Web sites, as well as from members of her list. "I can receive about 10 or 15 articles a day. I don't want to inundate my members, however, so I send out a maximum of two items daily."

Her trademark, she said, is creating writing challenges for her members.

"When something appears in the media that condemns Israel or the Jews, action must be taken. Most people want to do something, but don't know who to write or what to say.

"I put out an action alert and supply members with names and addresses. I also provide them with sample letters and letter-writing tips. It is important to be courteous, brief and original.

"I tell them that if people in positions of responsibility receive enough letters, they will pay attention. I also encourage them to write the media. They need to hear from us."

Shirley Anne Haber

She does not orchestrate anything, she said. "I send out information and make it easy for people to do what is in their hearts. I offer a service. People need the tools to know how to speak out."

She asks people to send her copies of her letters so she can provide them with feedback. "I give them encouragement and advice. I tell them if I feel they should alter something, or if they should send the letter out to more people."

One of her first writing challenges revolved around the 2001 World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa.

"We wrote strong letters to the government alerting them that Israel and the Jews were being discriminated against, and at that point, we did not want a Canadian sent to Durban.

"Some of these letters were taken to Durban and presented to the head of the Canadian delegation, so he would know how Canadians feel."

Haber said she is sometimes on the computer for eight to 10 hours a day, and has recently purchased a laptop computer so she can work while babysitting her grandchildren. "Every morning, I scan the three newspapers, and I regularly watch CBC, because I am concerned about how it presents Israel.

"I do a lot of writing to CBC. I have a subgroup that focuses on it."

She is overwhelmed, she said, to be named JWI's woman of the year. "It confirms that what I am doing is so important for Israel and for the Jewish community."

JWI's woman of the year luncheon takes place March 23, 10:30 a.m. at the Paradise Banquet and Convention Centre. For information, call JWI at 416-630-9313.

Young leadership set to "IMAGINE" the possibilities

At a time when many Jewish leaders are lamenting a perceived lack of Jewish interest from young men and women, it's encouraging to see what's planned for Montreal this April.

United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC), UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and Jewish Federations across Canada have created "Imagine," an International Young Leadership Conference for young Jewish adults from around the world.

Over 500 people between the ages of 25 and 45 are expected to attend the conference from April 4 to 6, with the Toronto contingent at 100. Also taking part in the weekend will be young adults from the United States, Europe, Israel, South America and Australia.

"Two years ago, the Young Leadership Conference in Ottawa was wonderful," says Jessica Cooperman, Chair, along with Brian Tanner of Toronto's Young Adult Division. "This year's event in Montreal is going to be incredible with people from around the world. It's such a great chance to network with worldwide young Jewish leadership. We're all looking forward to it. There's already a feeling of electricity about it and it's still not for a couple of months."

The goal of the weekend is to help young Jewish leaders share ideas while enhancing their leadership skills through networking, speakers, and a series of interactive workshops led by experienced community leaders from around the country. The conference will feature top international talent, from business, entertainment, spirituality and motivation fields. The outcome of the weekend will be better-equipped young Jewish leaders and a national network to continue the dialogue into the future.

"It is a chance for young Jews to reflect on the world today and to have their spirits lifted, to hear inspiring stories and to bond with other young Jews in similar positions," says Imagine co-chairs Karyn Saragossi and Heather Adelson-Zipkin. "It will be a weekend that will set the standards for all Young Leadership conferences that will follow."

Participants at the last Young Leadership Conference in Ottawa.

Speakers include Rabbi Shmuel Boteach, MP Irwin Cotler, and Israel's Ambassador to Canada, Haim Divon, Ellen Cannon, and John Loftus

A "Club Med Day" brings interested participants to Montreal's newly renovated YM-YWHA Jewish Community Centre. There they will spend Sunday working out or enjoying the health centre.

Another unique aspect of this year's Young Leadership Conference is The Mystery Ball. Billed as the "must-attend party of the year," it is the first international ball for young Jewish people held in North America. The black-tie affair is being organized to allow conference guests to explore Montreal's unique food, fashion, culture, festivals and nightlife.

legacy of life

Meyer W. Gasner 1906 – 1974

a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto

If the city ever proclaims an official day dedicated to the Jewish community's many successes, it would be most fitting to call it Meyer W. Gasner Day.

That's because MW, as he was known, gave the community its start. He's the man who spearheaded almost every aspect of Jewish living in Toronto, be it Jewish education, kashruth, rabbinical councils, Israel campaigns and much more. He was an Orthodox Jew, yet he was able to bring together Jews from every movement and faction and keep them talking to each other. He was a man for all seasons and was highly respected for being so.

"How do you describe 'larger than life?'" asks his grandson Robert Gasner. "Zaidy was an honest, ethical, modern Orthodox Jew who understood what it was to be a Jew and how to live in a very difficult time and a difficult world. He was a very altruistic and philanthropic man who got things done. Through his power, he was able to single-handedly create an organized, vibrant and thriving Jewish community."

Meyer grew up on the Lower East Side of Manhattan, the second of six children. He was a Talmudic scholar, graduating from what became known as Yeshiva University. One day, while working as a salesman for a fabric company, he happened upon a lovely girl named Goldie Segal who had been visiting a friend in his apartment building. Before long, he had followed Goldie to Toronto, where they got married and started their new life.

Meyer put everything he had into everything he did. In 1927, he and a friend went into the auto parts business and were very successful. But Meyer left it in 1942, using his many contacts to help the U.S. government secure elusive aircraft parts during the war. He then became the Canadian sales rep for a Chicago-based auto parts company and went on to head up Midas Muffler Canada.

Meyer Gasner at a function with David Ben Gurion.

Despite being busy with his profession and his growing family, Meyer was constantly looking after his community, too. Through his power of persuasion and his deep sense of Jewish pride, Meyer succeeded in bringing people together to talk, to brainstorm, and to act. He became a director of UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education and helped build Associated Hebrew Schools. He helped acquire the land where Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue now stands and was shul president in the early 1950s. He managed to get the city's rabbis to sit together and discuss important community issues. He was among the first in the city to publicly appeal for Israel Bonds. He supported many causes including Baycrest Centre and Mount Sinai Hospital and fought hard to establish kosher kitchens there and at the city's major hotels. And he was so struck by the State of Israel that he became the first importer of Carmel Wines and brought many other Israeli products to Canada.

But perhaps Meyer's most famous achievement was the creation of the Kashruth Council of Toronto – COR – which gave a uniform stamp of approval to all kosher products and establishments in the city.

"Pop fought for unity," says his son Leon. "He felt it was important for every thought-provoking Jew who wanted to see Judaism thrive. He didn't believe in fragmentation. He had friends in all walks of life and was very well respected. They're still talking about him."

Adds Robert, who became active in Jewish campus activity and UJA because of his grandfather's influence: "Of all the community leaders I know, Zaidy is the one who's the most sorely missed. He was the bridge between all of the different organizations and types of people in the city. If we could build another Meyer W. Gasner, the community would be so well off."

Samuel J. Sable, Meyer's co-conspirator when it came to Jewish causes, says his close friend and mentor would be extremely pleased with how the community has flourished.

"When I go to a function and see all our young people so concerned about the community and Israel and UJA, I'm so proud because we created it all 45 years ago," says Sam, 90, who established the Meyer W. Gasner Memorial Scholarship Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto. The fund annually awards scholarships to Toronto high school graduates who are planning a year of study in Israel and intend to pursue a career in Jewish education. "They are our future leaders, and Meyer would be as proud as I am of the marvelous job they do."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who have made an exceptional contribution to our community.

Generating warmth on "one cool day"

Hands on Toronto (HOT), a project of UJA Federation's Young Adult Division, and the creator of the annual One Hot Day, recently held its first-ever "winterized" version of the program. With freezing temperatures and blizzard-like conditions, One Cool Day lived up to its name.

HOT's inaugural One Cool Day afforded many young adults (25-45) the opportunity to perform a series of mitzvot (good deeds) throughout the community through initiatives specifically designed to let participants roll up their sleeves for a hands-on approach.

On this day, volunteers chose from a dozen programs including Restore our Heritage, in which they participated in the beautification and restoration of Kensington Market's historic Minsker Shul; Spread Care Around the World, to prepare care packages for needy families, and Adopt a Bubie and Zaidie for a Day, an interactive group program at a local nursing home.

"Despite the snowstorm and freezing temperatures, the feeling of warmth from all of our volunteers came through loud and clear," says Lisa Dolovich, Chair of One Cool Day, along with Devra Jackson and Betsy Silverfine.

Dolovich participated in the Calling all Movers and Drivers! program that saw her and other volunteers picking up donations which they then presented to an Etobicoke women's shelter.

Jackson, who also picked up donations when she wasn't sorting and selling clothes in the JF&CS Just-A-Second shop, was pleased – but not terribly surprised - by the turnout.

"Seeing so many young people in our community energized and eager to help the less fortunate really says a great deal," notes Jackson.

"The volunteers I spoke with after One Cool Day really felt that they were making a strong contribution to the Toronto community-at-large," says Silverfine. "These people who come out and give so much of themselves are extremely interested in continuing on and growing even more in terms of community involvement."

Nadal JCC names new executive director

When the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre opens "officially" this summer, the new state-of-the-art Centre will also boast a new "state-of-the-art" Executive Director, Naomi Rose.

Naomi Rose

Rose, a 48-year-old native of Saskatoon, and a Toronto resident since 1975, assumed her position in December, 2002. It's a position she is clearly ready for.

"My long-term goal is to do everything possible to ensure that the new Nadal Centre is not only rejuvenated, but that we will be the focal point, the epicenter, of a completely rejuvenated and flourishing downtown Jewish community," says Rose.

The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, an initiative of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto Tomorrow, is a 43,000 square foot facility - on the site of the venerable Bloor Jewish Community Centre - which will host a wide range of daily activities.

"I see three major challenges in my new position," says Rose. "Firstly, of course, is to complete the construction, planning and renovations. That's the short-term challenge. My mid-term challenge is to grow our membership based on the tremendous new facilities at the Nadal Centre. The long-term goal of all of us is to intensify and expand the eclectic programs offered here."

Rose, who was hired after the untimely death of her predecessor Bill Emery, in March, 2002, has a rich history of service for Toronto's Jewish community over the last 20 years. She has been involved with UJA Federation since 1982, and currently serves as a member of UJA Federation's Board of Directors.

"My experience in the Jewish community has always been on the lay-leadership side," she says. "Now, as a professional, it's interesting to sit on the other side of the desk for a change."

"The Nadal Centre is an incredible organization, not just the structure itself, but its 'Jewish heart' as well," says Rose. "We have a dedicated, excited membership who bring a caring, loyal atmosphere, and a strong sense of camaraderie, community and belonging. The positive example of Jewish values that is evident among our membership builds goodwill between our community and the non-Jewish community. That's good for everyone."

Exploring Doing Jewish in Toronto is a slam-dunk!

Made possible through generous funding from Ontario's Ministry of Citizenship, Culture and Recreation, Doing Jewish in Toronto is a new and innovative component of UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto website - www.jewishtoronto.net. Jewish Toronto is one of North America's most comprehensive community sites with news and information about Toronto's Jewish community, Israel and the Jewish world.

The idea for the state-of-the-art Doing Jewish in Toronto initiative sprang from UJA's Internet Steering Committee, chaired by Art Benjamin and Bob Cherniak. "This is definitely an idea whose time has come," says Benjamin. "Instead of spending countless hours on the Internet surfing from site to site, Doing Jewish in Toronto makes community involvement simple."

Regular users agree. "I use Doing Jewish in Toronto to find out about places to volunteer and to check what events are going on," says Alanna Petroff. "Last week I used it to find out about scholarships for university available through our Jewish community."

Doing Jewish in Toronto supports a number of sections including Community Directory, What's On and Volunteering.

The Community Directory lists almost 700 synagogues, agencies, services, schools and groups, including names, addresses, emails and contact names. It provides a number of search features to help people find the organizations or services they need. Articles let the community know what new or established organizations have to offer. There's also the opportunity for groups and individuals to submit articles about their community involvement.

What's On, a community calendar, lets a person check what events are taking place by date or by sponsoring organizations. On the site, visitors can add an event to a Personal Calendar, which allows users to include special dates such as birthdays and yahrtzeits, with the system providing reminders for these dates.

The Volunteering component offers a comprehensive listing of organizations representing all aspects of Toronto's Jewish community. The list includes something for everyone - adults, youth and entire families. Someone looking to get involved can contact an organization directly with a description of what he or she would like to do and what can be offered. Doing Jewish in Toronto also offers organizations a set of easy-to-use tools to create or enhance their own Web sites and to post articles for the community-at-large.

This month, Doing Jewish in Toronto is holding a contest to encourage visitors to the site.

For a chance to win Raptors tickets, and much more, go to UJA Federation's Jewish Toronto homepage at www.jewishtoronto.net and follow the link to Doing Jewish in Toronto Contest.

"Doing Jewish in Toronto makes getting involved a slam-dunk! And the contest is a fun way to explore all it has to offer," says Benjamin.

York Region police ready to fight anti-Semitism, forum told

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Len Rudner

York Region's burgeoning Jewish community received assurances last week that police are ready to respond to any emergency related to growing tensions in the Middle East.

"We are ready. We have over 1,000 personnel trained in emergency response and preparedness," York Region Police Chief Armand La Barge told a sparsely attended public forum at the Garnet Williams Community Centre in Thornhill. "We're ready for any kind of biological and chemical attack."

La Barge conceded that a war in Iraq "could escalate tensions" in York Region, home to an estimated 50,000 Jewish residents.

But he also sought to assure the Jewish population with figures showing that the region's police force is well-funded and well-equipped, and now employs nearly 1,000 officers and about 300 civilians, making it the third largest police force in Ontario.

York Region, La Barge said, is growing at the rate of 40,000 residents a year, and its population now stands at 832,000.

He said he knows the Jewish community "wants to see a police presence around schools and religious institutions," and said his force is prepared to deliver.

The annual forum for the Jewish community, held by York Region Police in partnership with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, and B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights this year drew more communal and civic figures, as well as police officers, than members of the public.

Overviews of police operations were delivered by the supervisors of the precincts 2 District and 4 District.

Sgt. Heidi Schellhorn of the force's hate crimes unit noted that last year, police investigated 71 hate-motivated crimes in the region (up from 68 the year before), of which 24 – or about one-third of the total – were directed at Jews and Jewish interests.

However, she said 90 per cent of those attacks were mischief against property, including graffiti. Only two were assaults.

There were five charges laid last year relating to hate crimes. One has been dismissed and the others are before the courts.

Though the numbers are relatively small, "there's no excuse for any kind of hate crime," Schellhorn said.

Schellhorn also said the situation in the Middle East has the potential to "spill over" into York Region.

Concerns raised at the community forum included dealing with suspicious packages and vehicles at schools, synagogues and communal buildings, as well as the need for beefed up patrols and more "beat" constables.

The CJC's Len Rudner tried to put a positive spin on numbers showing a small overall rise in hate-motivated crimes.

"The activity [against Jews] has been directed at property, rather than individuals," Rudner said. "In a way, that's good news, but it's also small comfort. Things don't start bad. They start small.

"The real good news is that police respond."

York Region is Canada's third-largest Jewish community. Planners predict the Jewish population will swell to 75,000 by 2010.

Recent figures show it's a young community. In York Region, 34 per cent of the Jewish population is 14 and under, compared to 16 per cent in Toronto. And over half York Region's Jews are between 30 and 49.

Thornhill is the region's most Jewish area. Nearly a third of its residents are Jewish.

Officials are also looking forward to work beginning on a planned multi-purpose community centre/campus on the southwest corner of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Drive in Richmond Hill.

for a tow truck for his son's car. Though the case attracted international attention, with some commentators and community leaders saying it was part of a wider, international pattern of attacks on Jews, Toronto police downplayed any racial or religious motivation in the crime.

Another high profile – but far less deadly – incident involved a Jewish doctor who was pushed to the ground and injured while heckling an anti-Israel demonstration in downtown Toronto. Charges were laid in that case and the incident was included in the report, Hogan said.

Rudner acknowledged that while the data showed fewer incidents involving Jews, there are many in the Jewish community experiencing anxiety over safety issues, a feeling magnified by the increased security at Jewish institutional buildings and synagogues.

Coupled with reports of numerous anti-Semitic incidents in Europe along with the post-Durban demonization of Israel, the cumulative affect is a feeling of anxiety, he said.

"One can also call it existential angst, part of being Jewish in the 21st century," he added.

Mission delegates to Israel now have a mission here

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Lynn Cutler and Beth Werger didn't hesitate to show up at a 9:30 a.m. synagogue meeting to report on their 10-day trip to Israel, even though they'd just returned home three hours earlier.

The two women, representing Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, were the only Canadians among 29 participants on the mid-February Team Israel Study Mission, a joint program of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism (USCJ) and Mercaz USA (the Zionist organization of the Conservative movement in the United States).

Lynn Cutler, left, and Beth Werger, see Jerusalem from the Haas Promenade.

The mission was designed to help synagogue professionals and lay leaders find ways to strengthen congregants' connection with Israel, according to a USCJ news release.

"Our job is to create more Israel awareness in our synagogues and a better engagement between our members and Israel," said Cutler, 52, a Beth Emeth board member and mother of three who works in an accountants' office.

"We are very pumped," said Werger, 44, who is president of the synagogue's Young Families group, explaining why she and Cutler agreed to Rabbi Howard Morrison's request that they address the Sunday morning meeting regarding a synagogue tour to Israel scheduled for May. Werger said they thought it was important to show prospective participants that they'd been to Israel and returned, and that it was a good place to go.

The women will speak about their experience March 7 at the congregation's Shabbat Across America service. They are waiting to receive programming ideas from Israel arising from brainstorming sessions with their counterparts from 10 American congregations during the trip.

Cutler said she came back feeling "that the entire Jewish community worldwide has a role and a stake in developing Jewish culture and Jewish identity around the world and in Israel."

The safety question – or "fear factor," as Cutler put it – that has been behind a dramatic decline in tourism since the current intifadah began in 2000 was not really an issue for the two women. "I didn't hesitate," said Cutler.

"Everywhere we went there were security people," added Werger, a dental hygienist and mother of two children, aged seven and 10. "I would go back in a minute."

Ironically, some of the American participants said they felt safer in Israel than at home, reported Cutler. "They were hearing stories about Code Orange and buying duct tape [reflecting fears of an attack in the United States]."

Israelis they met thanked them and congratulated them for coming. The dearth of tourists struck the women when they arrived in Israel before the American contingent and realized that, themselves included, their hotel had only eleven guests.

Mission participants returned with a better understanding of the way people live in Israel, said Werger. Part of the time was spent learning about Masorti Judaism, as the Conservative movement is known in Israel, and "learning how it can make a contribution to Israeli society, especially given the huge divide between the ultra-Orthodox and the secular. Masorti could potentially fill a void that needs to be filled."

They saw very few native Israelis when they visited Masorti congregations – mostly North American, Argentinian and South African olim, said Cutler.

"The Masorti movement has a lot of work still, in terms of Sabras," said Werger. The congregations need financial support and increased awareness of their existence, added Cutler.

They also came back with a heightened awareness of the impact of youth programs that are either not running or are down in numbers or amount of time spent in Israel, said Werger. Studies have shown that Israel experience trips have a positive correlation with future Jewish leadership, she said.

"It's so important for the youth to go to Israel," said Cutler, whose own children range in age from 18 to 24.

"Encouraging your children to participate in Israel experience programs is as important to pro-Israel activity as financial and political support," said Werger.

"For me, you can't be a Jew and not be connected to Israel. The fact that there are all those Arab countries around Israel makes it so imperative that we support and be connected to Israel and make sure that Israel survives. And if that means going there, sending my kids there, or increasing North Americans' awareness of Israel, then that's what we have to do."

Film buff turns author at age 82

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

At 82, Bill Stern is showing no signs of slowing down.

The social worker, fundraiser, volunteer and film buff also recently published his first book.

Seniors Scene

You Don't Have to be Jewish: Commentaries on a Selection of Jewish Content Films (Lugus Publications), which contains Stern's thoughts on 55 films, was launched at the Jewish Book Fair this past fall.

He says he wrote the book "to study and appreciate the important contribution Jewish content films have made to society through the film media. I believe this is our most important artform."

Stern, who has a large collection of Jewish movies, says he is not a film critic.

"I just love films."

Since he was a child, Stern has loved the Yiddish theatre and Jewish films. In the late 1920s and '30s, his father would take him every week to the Standard Theatre on Spadina Avenue at Dundas Street.

"This led me to my great love of Yiddish theatre and I remember great artists like Maurice Schwartz, Aaron Lebedeff and Molly Picon," he says.

Stern attended Central Technical School and served in the Royal Canadian Air Force. While waiting for repatriation, he went to the employment counselling department of the YMCA in London, England, where he saw numerous pamphlets on a variety of professions, including social work.

"I didn't know what social work was, but reading about it got the ball rolling."

After his discharge in 1946, he studied at a special course for ex-servicemen at the University of Toronto.

At the same time, he volunteered at the University Settlement House.

"I was impressed with John Haddad, the executive director," Stern says. "He was so completely dedicated to the community and he inspired me and cemented my interest in social work."

After he graduated with a master's degree in social work in 1952, Stern accepted a position at the University Settlement House working with immigrant families. He later served as its executive director.

He also served as executive director at the Hamilton Council of Jewish Organizations and Hamilton Jewish Centre for 15 years. In 1978, he accepted the position of director of regions and western Canada director of the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science. In 1986, he formed his own fundraising company, Bill Stern Associates.

The list of organizations Stern has volunteered with includes the National Council of Jewish Women's task force for the disabled in Toronto, the University of Toronto, for which he received an Arbor Award for outstanding service, B'nai Brith Canada, where he served as president of Upper Canada Lodge, the Federation Council on Aging and St. Christopher House.

Upon Stern's retirement from the board of St. Christopher House, director Susan Woods wrote, "I want to tell you what a great job you have done and how very much everyone appreciates all the effort you have put into getting the alumni association off the ground.

"Bill, there is no way anyone else could have done for St. Chris what you have done."

Today, Stern says, "What gives me the greatest satisfaction is looking back at the many young people who I worked with and have now become leaders in the community."

He says he wrote You Don't Have to be Jewish "because I want other ethnic groups to know the contribution that Jewish culture has made to society."

He has thrown himself into the book the same way he has thrown himself into his career and volunteer activities. His love of theatre is felt on every page.

He says he still has reams of material left over. "There are many other films that I would like to write about. It took me several years to write this book with the financial help of generous people. I hope that some day, I will be able to publish volume two."

You Don't Have to be Jewish: Commentaries on a Selection of Jewish Content Films is available at Israel's Books, Negev Importing Co., David Mirvish Books and Books on Art.

March Break
My March break was fun. We stayed at the Toronto Marriott Eaton Centre Hotel. Mom says $119* to stay over with two kids is a really good deal. Two kids under 10 get to eat free in the restaurant with their Mom or Dad. And Dad was so happy when he heard about the $149* bargain package that includes parking and breakfast for Mom and him. We got to go to the Hockey Hall of Fame and we went skating across the street from the hotel. Later Dad took my brother swimming while I went shopping with Mom at the Eaton Centre and we used the discount card they gave us at the hotel. We all had lots of fun.
The End.
For reservations call 800/905-0647 and ask for rate code WPRK to receive the $119 Room-only rate. Ask for rate code PKGM for the $149 March Break Bargain package that includes self-parking and breakfast for 2 adults.
Special $119 rate is also available some Fridays and Saturdays through April.

Village Shul celebrating its bar mitzvah

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The Village Shul and Aish HaTorah Learning Centre is celebrating its bar mitzvah, and the community is invited.

On the weekend of March 8 and 9, the shul will be holding a shabbat celebration and tribute dinner.

During the Shabbat service, there will be classes by Rabbi Yaacov Palatnik, the former rabbi of the Village Shul who is presently in Denver, Colo. The Toronto Men's Choir, led by Harvey Erlich, will participate in the Shabbat service, which will be followed by a community kiddush.

On Saturday evening, the shul, located at at 1072 Eglinton Ave. W., will present a melaveh malka at 8 p.m. featuring New York comedian Marc Weiner. The event is open to the community.

The highlight of the weekend celebration, says shul president Richard Posluns, will be a tribute dinner Sunday night honouring three men who spearheaded the building of the Village Shul: Leslie Dan, Peter Friedmann, and Allen Berg.

"Over the past 13 years, the growth that the Village Shul has experienced and its effect on Toronto has been remarkable," said Nancy Weisbrod, the shul's first president.

"Organizations throughout North America have used the Village Shul as a model of learning, prayer and bringing people together. Just as a bar/bat mitzvah celebrates the potential of the individual, may our community, our beloved Village Shul, merit to continue to be a source of strength, wisdom and kindness."

Some 15 years ago, a handful of families met in each other's homes before holding services at the Beth Lida Synagogue. In 1990, they rented a store on Eglinton Ave.

"Through the efforts of the three honorees and many others, the beautiful shul was built of Jerusalem stone," Weisbrod said. "Our emphasis was, and is, study for all ages and creating a warm and welcoming environment."

Dan was born in Budapest, Hungary and came to Canada in 1947 as a young war refugee. A graduate of both the University of Toronto's school of pharmacy and a MBA program, he went on to build a successful pharmaceutical business. Along with his many philanthropic activities, he has been a strong supporter of Aish HaTorah.

Friedmann was born in Kosice, Czechoslovakia, and came to Canada with his family in 1968. He graduated in chemical engineering from the University of Western Ontario (UWO) and developed major businesses in North America and Europe.

He supports many religious and educational organizations in Canada, Israel and Europe and is a past president of the Village Shul.

Berg, who is the current chairman of the shul's board of directors, was born in a displaced persons camp in Ginsberg, Germany. His family came to Canada and settled in London, Ont., when he was a baby.

He graduated from UWO with a B.Sc. in applied mathematics and received a master's in engineering from U of T. He taught at York University and went on to build Computer Methods International Corporation.

"Thank God, we are building a community whose purpose and mission is beyond thinking about ourselves. In our mission statement, our ultimate goal of making an impact is clearly stated," said Rabbi Ahron Hoch, the shul's spiritual leader.

"Our programming reflects this through initiatives that serve to strengthen communities in addition to our own, such as the [shul's] Jewish Family Institute and an amazing array of classes. These are open to everyone."

Weisbrod added that the classes, seminars and home study groups are what make the Village Shul successful. "It makes Torah come alive for today's thinking Jews."

For more information on the bar mitzvah celebrations, call 416-785-1107, ext. 306, or visit the Web site villageshul.com.

The three honorees of the Village Shul's bar mitzvah tribute dinner, from right, Leslie Dan, Peter Friedmann and Allen Berg, are seen at the groundbreaking ceremony for the shul's building five years ago.

Student-to-student advice on choosing a campus

By LEORA BERESKIN

It is a wonderful time for all you students in your final year of high school. You have less than one semester left and then you will be done.

In four short months, you will be free! Or so you think. I hate to break it to you guys, but if you're planning on going to university, you'll have at least three more years of late night studying and difficult exams. But don't get too discouraged. University can be a ton of fun… provided you pick the right school.

With 68 universities in Canada and many more throughout the world, choosing a school is not an easy task. There are a number of important factors to consider. First, do you want to stay at home or go to school in a different city?

I left my home in Toronto to go to the University of Waterloo, and I'm very happy with my choice. But it is definitely not for everyone. My friend Alona, 19, decided to stay at home and go to York University because, she said, "So many things are changing when you go to university. Do you really want the added stress of living on your own? Cooking and cleaning for yourself?"

To a certain degree, I agree with her, but living in residence in first year helps ease the transition. I didn't have to cook for myself, because I had a meal plan, and I didn't have to clean, because the residence offered a "housemom," a wonderful woman who cleaned my room once a week (she was like a mother, but without the nagging!).

I left home because I wanted the independence. I wanted to be able to come home late at night from "studying at the library" without waking anyone in the house. Although, sadly, many times when I do come home late at night, I actually have been studying at the library. That's university for you!

If you decide that you want to go away, then you have to think about how far away your school will be. Luckily, my university is only an hour and a half drive from Toronto, so I can come home for the Jewish holidays and whenever I feel homesick. If I went to school in British Columbia, I wouldn't be able to come home as often. Plus, I have no idea how I would move my belongings back and forth if I lived far away. I was amazed when my brother Fred went on an academic exchange to Hong Kong last semester and he took only two bags with him. It takes me two car trips to transport my stuff to Waterloo! I think it's a guy thing.

When going away to university, your school should ideally be far enough away for you to have your independence, but close enough for you to come home for weekend visits and maybe to have your mom do your laundry.

Another very important consideration as you contemplate university is money. University is not cheap. Tuition is at least $3,000 a year, but there are many other costs – for books, transportation, room and board, and so on. Many students don't want to take out loans because they don't want to begin their lives thousands of dollars in debt.

But there are other ways to finance your education. I chose to attend Waterloo because of its fabulous co-op program that allows me to work in my field of study, getting money and valuable experience. There are also tons of scholarships and bursaries available, so it is worth finding out about them. And there's the option of working part time while going to school.

These are some things to consider in choosing your university, but other students may have different criteria. Sophie, a 19-year-old student at University of Toronto, admits that one of the reasons she went to U of T is that the campus's architecture is so attractive. Jennifer, 21, went to the University of Western Ontario because she heard that it was a real party school. Dan, 20, went to McGill University, because he loves Montreal and wanted to live in a fun city.

These reasons might sound a little unusual and inappropriate to the more conservative among you, but I think that they are still valid criteria. After all, this is where you'll be spending at least three years, so you may as well go to a university that you'll enjoy.

High school guidance counsellors are always saying that getting accepted into your school of choice is not the hardest part of university. I agree.

But while they say that the hardest part is continuing to succeed academically, or something like that, I think that the most difficult part is choosing which university to attend, because there are so many wonderful choices.

Jewish University Fair offers a 'fair' view of university

How big is the Jewish population on campus? Is it possible to keep kosher in residence? Will I find myself a nice Jewish guy/girl in this university?

These were some of the questions high school students asked at the recent Jewish University Fair organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto (formerly Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto).

The fair at the Lipa Green building was an opportunity to learn more about specific universities, meet current students and have some free pizza. By the end of the first hour, about 100 people had already come through.

Like most university fairs, this one had official representatives to talk about their school's departmental programs, admissions and campus life. But this one had a distinctly Jewish slant, and questions like the ones above were answered by students and staff affiliated with Jewish campus clubs.

"I think a lot of students and their parents are worried about Jewish life in some of the Ontario cities, like Kingston and Guelph," said fair co-ordinator Nikki Greenspan. "This is a great chance for them to see that there are vibrant communities all over."

Greenspan said she went to York University partly because she wanted to stay in a Jewish environment. But, as notable Jew Bob Dylan has said, "The times, they are a-changin'."

"There are now Jewish student communities all over, bursting out. The whole point of the fair is to let people know that it is possible to go to any Ontario university and live Jewishly," Greenspan said.

Shira Stein, a Grade 12 student who is considering one of the smaller campuses, agreed. "I'm so used to being in a Jewish environment," she said. "I think it will be weird to go to a completely different place."

Stein went to the Ontario University Fair last fall, but came to this one as well because it addressed different concerns, she said.

University representatives were on hand to answer questions and reassure parents concerned about this year's double cohort. The University of Guelph representative said they have been doing mass hiring of faculty, and construction is under way to make room for the new students.

I came out of the Jewish University Fair with the assurance that there are Jewish student communities all over Ontario, and that there is always the opportunity to stay involved in Jewish life, no matter which school you choose.

Universities must help end intimidation of Jewish students

By GERALDINE SHERMAN

Guest Voice

With video cameras rolling, we watched jubilant Palestinians in a second story window proudly display their hands washed in Israeli blood while everyone below celebrated. We witnessed American journalist Daniel Pearl murdered in Pakistan after confessing to the crime of being a Jew. We looked on after former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's speech was cancelled at Concordia University, as Montreal Jews were escorted to safety through an angry crowd of anti-Israel thugs. Along with the rest of the world, we witnessed these crimes, were revolted and responded.

Within the cloistered world of the university, however, there are events that are rarely seen by the public. Where there are no cameras, incidents often go unreported. Last December, Solidarity with Jews At Risk, a Toronto-based activist group, ran an ad in the Globe and Mail with the tagline "Silence Is Not The Answer." It was signed by 108 concerned Canadians, Jews and non-Jews, all with their own different views on the Middle East, but all with a keen interest in higher education and free speech.

The ad tried to describe current conditions for Jewish students on campus. It wrote of the chill that affects them when the subject of Israel is raised. It explained how some students have been frightened into silence and others forced into unwanted debate. University administrators were called upon to recognize that prevailing pro-Palestinian views make balanced speech difficult.

We suggested four specific ways to correct the problem: policies against racism must include anti-Semitism, so that what is inappropriate when said about other nationalities or states is also inappropriate when said about Israelis and Jews; rules must guarantee students safety and be applied even-handedly; university funding must be removed from organizations that sponsor violence; and any student convicted in a court of law for inciting violence must be appropriately disciplined.

The day after this public statement appeared, the National Post printed a summary of interviews with 10 university administrators. Not surprisingly, most of them denied the problem exists on their respective campuses. If they did acknowledge its existence, they said it isn't serious. They were, however, willing to admit there are problems at other universities.

In our research over the last half year, we learned of a student wearing a kippah who was beaten at York University and another at McMaster University who had eggs thrown at him. A Dalhousie University student chose to sit silently in the dining hall as students around him called for an end to the Jewish state, after his previous attempts to respond with a different point of view were met with hostility. A Trent University professor published an article in the left-wing magazine CounterPunch that accused all Jews of being complicit in "Israel's crimes." And a Jewish professor at Université de Quebec in Montreal was prevented from delivering a class on democracy by several dozen students.

In addition, swastikas have appeared regularly on the walls of York and McMaster. A poem appeared in York's school newspaper that stated "you have to be white or a Jew for the pendulum to shift in your favour." And Jewish students at McGill University have been forced to confront graffiti that says, "There will be no more anti-Semitism when there are no more Jews."

When guest speakers are invited to campuses to represent Israel's perspective, they are often greeted by hooligans. At the University of Victoria, the Israeli ambassador had his car rocked, and the auditorium lights were turned out in the middle of his talk at Queen's University.

Across the country, Jewish students are being dragged into discussions that force them to defend their identity. When they argue in support of Israel, they are often shouted down, ridiculed or greeted with threats and even physical assault. Most often, they lapse into lonely silence or huddle together for support.

I am not suggesting that debate stop. In fact, I think it should be encouraged where all sides are able to speak freely and no one is permitted to preach racism or incite violence.

Our universities are granted the mandate and the resources to transmit knowledge, encourage intellectual inquiry and support civil debate. The atmosphere in classrooms and on campuses must encourage these precepts. Professors and administrators must honour their responsibilities if all students are to receive the education they deserve. It takes only a few incidents to silence a community, especially a community of young Jews who carry the weight of historic injustice.

Our students must feel free to defend their beliefs and the state of Israel. They must not be forced to spend their university years in a perpetual cycle of attack and rebuttal. They must not be intimidated. Denial by university administrators will not do. They have the facts and know what is required. We expect them to act.

Geraldine Sherman is a Toronto writer and a co-founding member of Solidarity with Jews at Risk.

Coast to Coast

Winnipeg Jewish leaders greet census with caution

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After years of decreasing, the number of people identifying themselves as ethnically Jewish in Manitoba is actually up a little, according to the recent Statistics Canada figures. Still, community leaders are greeting the new stats with caution.

"The numbers are great," says Faye Rosenberg-Cohen, planning director for the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg-Combined Jewish Appeal, "but we are still waiting to see the religious data."

The census figures show that 15,130 Manitobans identified as Jewish by ethnic origin in 2001, compared to 14,955 in 1996. (Almost all Jewish Manitobans live in Winnipeg.) The only other Canadian community to report an increase in its ethnic Jewish population was Toronto.

Number who identify themselves as ethnic Jews up slightly

The flip side of the coin is that a larger number of those identifying as ethnic Jews in Winnipeg/Manitoba reported being Jewish and of other ethnic origins – 6,845 on the 2001 census, compared to 5,935 in 1996.

"The size of our population remains an issue," says Bob Silver, chair of the community's Grow Winnipeg initiative, whose goal is a Jewish population of 18,000 by the end of the decade. "I am still very concerned about having the critical mass we need to support all the services that the community expects. If the population numbers are slightly up, that is encouraging. But the task in front of us is still daunting. We still have a long way to go."

Rosenberg-Cohen reports that the community's database lists a Jewish population that has not changed much over the past five years – about 13,000 in Winnipeg, a slightly lower number than the one on the census.

"We know there are people who are not listed on our database," she says. "We also know anecdotally that there has been a steady stream of immigrants from Russia by way of Israel over the last few years."

Rosenberg-Cohen points out that the 2001 census is more accurate than the 1996 mini-census because the latter figures were based on a sampling of 20 per cent of the population, while 2001 was a full census year.

She adds that the growing Argentine Jewish population in Winnipeg was not a part of the 2001 census. Since that census, about 50 Jewish families from Argentina have settled in Winnipeg in response to this community's six-year-old outreach effort, and another 50 families are expected here within the next 12 months.

Author chronicles tales of Righteous Gentiles

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Some time in the middle of World War II, German police officer Albert Jurgens had a chance encounter that changed several lives.

Jurgens was standing in a Berlin railway station when he struck up a conversation with a stranger. "We got to talking," he said, and pretty soon, the stranger and his wife were guests in his home.

For Jurgens, his invitation presented all sorts of dangers, as the couple he hosted were Jews trying to evade the Nazis crackdown, and penalties for those who helped Jews could be severe.

In the end, Jurgens lost his job, but not before he managed to procure for the couple false papers and travel with them to the Swiss border, where he smuggled them across.

Jurgens' story was told in a 1973 television documentary and was picked up by British historian Martin Gilbert, who included it in his most recent book, The Righteous; The Unsung Heroes of the Holocaust (Key Porter Books).

The story was one of thousands included by Gilbert in his book, but it was far from the only one to come out of Berlin and other cities in Nazi Germany.

The stories of Righteous Gentiles saving Jews in the heart of Berlin, where the Gestapo and the SS had their headquarters, are among the many jarring revelations in Gilbert's latest work. In fact, notes Gilbert, while 170,000 of Berlin's prewar Jewish residents either emigrated or were deported, some 2,000 survived the war in the Nazis' capital city itself.

They could not have done so without the co-operation of thousands, perhaps tens of thousands of Berliners who defied the Nazis, he adds.

Gilbert, a prodigious writer who has authored Winston Churchill's official biography and numerous books about World War II, points out it was probably the fact that Berlin was indeed the Nazi capital that helped save Jews.

As the capital, the city was home to numerous diplomats and envoys from neutral states and so their presence helped restrain the Nazis. In his diaries, Nazi propaganda minister Josef Goebbels noted that "people were coming to him saying, this is an A-1 Jew, so it was a vulnerable point for the Nazis," Gilbert recalled.

One example of the special care taken by Nazis in connection with Berlin Jews took place on Feb. 27, 1943, when the Gestapo rounded up 4,700 Jewish men who were married to non-Jewish women. They were taken to a collection centre in the city, pending deportation to death camps.

Martin Gilbert

To the surprise of Nazi authorities, the arrests prompted a spontaneous protest by the men's wives, eventually growing to 2,000 women who camped out in the street for a week and would not leave until their husbands were set free. On March 6, Goebbels gave in and declared the men "privileged persons." The husbands survived the war in Berlin.

Goebbels, Gilbert said, "just couldn't face in the capital any sort of trouble."

Gilbert, who was in Toronto recently to publicize his book, recounts numerous examples of Germans hiding Jews in the face of the Nazi program of murder.

Some, unlike the Berlin wives, did not escape the Nazis' wrath, paying for their acts of kindness with their lives. These acts of defiance played out right across Nazi-occupied Europe, and Gilbert reports the often riveting testimony that recounts how gentile friends and neighbours, and even strangers, saved Jews from death.

Gilbert, who began collecting eyewitness accounts in 1974, said he couldn't help notice the important role played by religious faith in motivating people to save Jews. "I was struck by the positive role of the church; of priests, religious leaders, nuns, archbishops, cardinals at the highest level of the hierarchy," he said.

It is, he acknowledged, "the exact reverse" of the position adopted by Daniel Goldhagen, who in A Moral Reckoning argued Catholic church doctrine about the Jews underpinned the Holocaust and the Catholic Church collaborated with the Nazis.

Gilbert, on the other hand, credits the Vatican with saving four-fifths of Roman Jewry, "the biggest saving ratio for any deportation."

The Righteous contains the stories of hundreds of Jews and their saviours, many of them heartbreaking and others inspiring. In trying to ascertain the motives of those who put their lives on the line to save Jews, Gilbert advances several possibilities. Some had known Jews before the war and were close personal friends or business associates. Others were motivated by their religious faith. Dislike of the German occupation prompted others to act, while in Albania, an ancient code that require guests to be protected helped save Jews.

On a national scale, Gilbert found responses differed from country to country. The Danes evacuated almost all its population to neutral Sweden while Bulgaria and Italy, while allies of Germany, refused to deport their Jews to their deaths. "The national ethos was such that the parliament resisted, the monarch resisted," Gilbert stated.

Many acted the way they did because it was for them simply the right thing to do.

Though he'd been collecting the stories for 25 years, Gilbert acknowledges that when he started, "it didn't seem right that the main focus in Holocaust studies should be a marginal group, decent people. Then gradually things changed."

The publication by Thomas Keneally of Schindler's List in 1982 opened the door, "but the real pressure came from people who had been rescued."

In 1993 Gilbert attended the second meeting of hidden children, young Jews who survived the war either in hiding or by masquerading as Christians. "There, they crowded around and said, 'tell our stories, tell our stories.'" Taking them up on their request, Gilbert stepped up his research, often visiting the extensive archives at Yad Vashem and supplementing that with extensive personal correspondence with survivors.

Gilbert acknowledged that not all survivors were happy with the project. "I met quite a number who felt that a focus on the righteous might take away from the narrative of the Holocaust and from the fact that so many people were not righteous, who collaborated...There may well have been far more collaborators than righteous among the captive peoples."

In fact, he pointed out, some of the righteous were killed by their neighbours after the war when they learned they had saved Jews.

A prolific author, Gilbert is already planning his next work. It will be a prequel to The Righteous, he said, a look at the diplomats who between 1933-40 gave Jews visas and helped them escape the looming Holo-

The Jews of Moises Ville, Argentina

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The establishment of Moises Ville in Argentina in the late 1880s, believed to be the first Jewish farming settlement in America, is a drama of Jews escaping eastern European persecution, the deceit of dishonest sellers of land, and hunger and death.

But it also tells the story of the tenacious survival instinct of the Jews that led to the development of a thriving community more than a century ago.

Moises Ville, in the Pampas region, became the model for 15 other Jewish farming communities in Argentina that saved thousands of Jews from the Holocaust.

The tales of the march westward in North America pale in comparison to the trek of the first group of educated immigrants escaping from the pogroms of Russia and the Ukraine – where borders were always changing.

They became gun-toting, Yiddish-speaking Jewish storekeepers, farmers and the famous Jewish gauchos (Argentine cowboys) who built synagogues and an opera house and provided higher education for their children and grandchildren.

Born in Moises Ville and now living in Toronto, Gladys Rothman, whose great-grandparents were among the village's first Jewish settlers, has spent several years collecting and recording its history.

Two years ago, Rothman and photographer Marilyn Westlake went to Moises Ville. When they returned, they created a catalogue called Moises Ville, Argentina: Where They Went To: First Jewish Settlement in Argentina, 1889.

The publication includes a short history of Moises Ville, 24 pictures and the names and ages of the first Jewish passengers who arrived in Argentina in 1889. Rothman has also produced a video that tells the story of Moises Ville.

A world traveller, Rothman, who received a post-graduate degree in cultural anthropology at the University of Sao Paulo, Brazil, and in Copenhagen, Denmark, came to Canada with her family in 1980 and graduated as a therapeutic family mediator at the University of Toronto. She speaks fluent Spanish and English and has a working knowledge of French, Portuguese and Italian.

"People have the obligation to remember and to transmit the history from one generation to the next," she told The CJN. "What better present can you give the people you love than the story of your family?"

Rothman is a sought-after speaker on Argentina and she has a passion for genealogy. Recently, she established her own company, Video Legacies International, which helps people and their families tell their stories on video and DVD for future generations.

Rothman said that along with receiving harsh treatment, Jews in Russia were prohibited from purchasing large tracts of land. In 1887, concerned Jews in the community held a conference in Katowice, Silece, Poland, to look for some way to help their suffering brothers. The prevailing thought was that they had to emigrate.

In their search for countries that would take them in, they discovered that the Argentinian Republic had passed the Avellanda Law of Immigration and Colonization in 1881.

Over the next few years, émigrés began leaving the Podolia, Gibernia, area in small groups. Led by a rabbi carrying his Torah, some 500 highly educated Jews left and were joined by others on an eight-month trip to the port at Bremerhaven, Germany.

The first Jewish settlement in Argentina, 1889

Along the way, they changed trains frequently, searched for kosher food and had babies. At one station, they were all arrested and spent 16 days in jail for attempting to purchase less expensive work train tickets, which was illegal since they were not working in Poland.

In 1888, 110 families – some 837 Jews of all ages – embarked on the ship the S.S. Weser for a 35-day, rough and crowded voyage. After 1½ years of travel, on Friday afternoon, Aug. 14, 1889, the group arrived in Argentina, but refused to leave the ship until the Sabbath had ended.

Rothman said that as they followed the rabbi holding the Torah off the ship, the longshoremen, who had never seen Jews, were so overcome by the scene that they removed their hats and bowed as the procession came through.

But after a final 18-hour train voyage, the weary travellers arrived at the Palacios train station to find that they were marooned and that the foreman who was to meet them with livestock and equipment was not there. As well, the land was not the agricultural land that they had been promised.

So they remained at the station, where they endured two months of hunger and cold, and the death of 67 children who were buried in old oil drums as there was no consecrated land. Many moved on, leaving behind 50 families, or about 300 people.

Eventually, Italian pioneers from a nearby village heard of their plight and came to their rescue. They cut roads, took the Jews out to land that could be farmed, brought them ploughs and oxen and taught them farming skills.

Rothman tells the story of her great-grandmother, Victoria Rothman, who opened a general store. In her apron, she carried two guns. When anyone came to rob her, she said, "You can rob me, but you touch my family and I will kill you."

As the community grew, Yiddish remained the spoken language, and the people who came to work and live there also spoke Yiddish. As well, they continued to observe the Sabbath. Even the non-Jews in the village closed their stores and businesses on Saturday. Jewish ranchers and gauchos became well-known for their skills throughout the country.

By the mid-1950s, the community peaked at 6,700, and had built a Hebrew school, a library, a multi-purpose opera house and four synagogues. The first and largest shul, the Baron Hirsch Synagogue, was named for their patron, Baron Maurice de Hirsch, who established the Jewish Colonization Association in 1891 to facilitate the mass emigration of Jews from eastern European countries by settling them in agricultural colonies purchased by the association.

The concept of the first Jewish agricultural community, similar to a moshav, proved to be an example for other Jewish villages that sprang up throughout the country. The success of Moises Ville attracted more than 400,000 Jews to Argentina.

"They were dreamers and intellectuals," Rothman said. "They also gave expression to their utopian and socialistic beliefs, which led to the forming of the first farmers' co-operatives in Argentina."

All this changed with Juan Peron's rise to power in the 1940s. Peron, who was a Nazi sympathizer, stopped Jewish immigration to Argentina after he became president in 1946. He also gave refuge to fleeing Nazis.

He did, however, establish diplomatic relations with Israel in 1949. Since then, more than 45,000 Jews have immigrated to Israel from Argentina.

From 1976 to 1983, a period known as the "dirty war," Argentina was under military rule. During this time, Jews were kidnapped and tortured by the ruling junta. More than 10 per cent of the "disappeared" people were Jews, a high number in proportion to the country's population. The remains of 2,000 Jews are still missing and families continue to plead with the government to tell them what happened to their loved ones.

It was during this military dictatorship that Rothman decided to leave. In 1980, she said, she read an issue of National Geographic magazine that had an article about Canada with a photograph of a duck-crossing sign in Victoria, B.C.

"I was mesmerized," Rothman said. "I decided that any country that would want to protect a duck would be a country that must have respect for people. I wanted my son to grow up in a place that respects human life."

Rothman wrote to the Canadian consulate seeking to become a permanent resident of Canada, and soon after, she left Argentina to move north.

A modern gaucho

Today, Moises Ville has almost disappeared as a Jewish town. Most of the young people who left for university have not returned. There are only 150 Jews left, Rothman said. Some of the Jews who are still there speak Yiddish and keep their stores closed Saturdays.

What remains is the Museum of Moises Ville, which tells the history of the village's Jewish population. It also tells the story of Jews throughout history who have run from oppression to welcoming countries. Jews everywhere are first encouraged to participate in the building of the economy and then struggle to create respectable lives for their families. Eventually, they are looked at as villains, and when they manage to escape from tyranny, they begin new lives.

In her own new life, Rothman has contributed to numerous causes. In 1987, she co-founded the Canadian branch of the Geneva, Switzerland-based Defence for Children International. The organization was largely responsible for pushing for the United Nations Convention on Children's Rights, which was passed by the General Assembly in 1991.

Rothman remains in touch with the Moises Ville museum, which has in its collection photos of her family. The museum is in financial need because of the current ecomonic crisis.

Despite the village's decline, Rothman said, "it is a story that needs to be told to the rest of the world. It is a story about sheer will and determination. It is a story about success. For almost 100 years, it was a magical paradise."

Continental Europe's only female rabbi

By ELIAS LEVY
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Pauline Bebe, the first woman to have been ordained in continental Europe, is the spiritual leader of the Liberal Jewish community of Paris.

As the only woman rabbi in France, she faced opposition from the Orthodox community from the beginning. She has persisted, however, and has served as the leader of a flourishing community for 12 years.

The influence of the worldwide Reform and Liberal movements, especially in the United States, she says, enable her to pass today from "justification" to "affirmation."

Last year, Rabbi Bebe published the Dictionary of women and Judaism, Isha (Editions Calmann-Levy). During her recent stay in Montreal, she was interviewed by CJN.

CJN: There was a hue and cry when you were appointed as a rabbi in the early 1990s, wasn't there?

Rabbi Bebe: There certainly was. My appointment as a rabbi aroused a lot of passion – hostility on the one hand, enthusiasm on the other.

At first I tried to justify myself. In Jewish law, there is nothing to oppose a woman fulfilling the function of a rabbi. But explanations are not enough. People remain attached to the bearded rabbi of their childhood.

Strangely enough, women were the most distrustful. I challenged their traditional role without intending to, but they usually change their minds when they attend a service and I put a sefer Torah in their arms; they have dreamed of this all their lives. Some have not come into a synagogue since their childhood and I tell myself that I am reconciling them with Judaism. Ultimately, I accepted the idea that I was a symbol.

CJN: What is Liberal Judaism?

Rabbi Bebe: Liberal Judaism advocates an evolution in tradition and an adaptation to modern times. Judaism has constantly evolved throughout history. It must continue to evolve and to take into account the progress of modern consciousness and civilization. Liberal Judaism believes there has been a progressive revelation – that there was a moment of revelation on Mount Sinai, and that that revelation has continued with every century and still continues today.

CJN: Your concept of Judaism is poles apart from that of Orthodox Jews.

Rabbi Bebe: That's true. From a historic point of view, Liberal Jews see things completely differently. For the Orthodox, there has been a core that has preserved a "pure" Judaism that has always remained the same.

According to the Orthodox, it is thanks to that core that Judaism has been preserved over the centuries. Liberal Judaism thinks the opposite. Liberal Jews feel that Judaism has continually evolved and that it has been kept alive because it has been able to evolve and progress. We have here two contradictory visions. Liberal Judaism is not a distortion of Judaism. It is simply a question of an evolution in Judaism that is inherent within Judaism itself.

CJN: Liberal Judaism has been accused of misrepresenting Halachah.

Rabbi Bebe: We have arguments to respond to that criticism. We show that very few laws have remained the same since biblical times.

For example, the death penalty has been repealed in Judaism. In any case, today it would be virtually unenforceable. There have been significant changes in many areas.

The laws pertaining to divorce have evolved considerably, for instance. The ketubah – certificate of marriage – did not exist in biblical times. We have to remember that Judaism has always been influenced by the socio-cultural context in which it was practised.

Rabbi Pauline Bebe

We think it is important for Judaism to continue to evolve as society evolves. For example, we feel that the movement towards equality between men and women is something positive.

Judaism must also take into consideration all the ethical changes current today. One cannot continue to profess to a Judaism that does not correspond to the ethical conscience of our time.

CJN: The Liberal movement advocates a more active participation of women in religious life and practices.

Rabbi Bebe: Widespread discourse with regards to the equality of men and women in Judaism has taken the form of apology.

It consists of putting forward texts that praise the Jewish woman for her special virtues, affirming that she is better than the man, even superior.

Thus, if she was excused from fulfilling a certain number of commandments, it is supposedly because she didn't need them or she had an innate awareness of the divine.

Sociological prejudices of a patriarchal origin are thus justified either by an immutable divine will or by biological differences.

The woman is that "more perfect" creature, "queen of the hearth, responsible for handing down..." This apology is a new form of sexism, more elaborate, more insidious, because it is expressed in the form of praise and not defamation.

This apology justifies in an underhanded way the segregation of women. Today, many women challenge the traditional role assigned to them by Orthodox Judaism. They want access to public religious participation. I believe they have the right to demand the equality that has been denied them for a long time.

CJN: Has Liberal Judaism had any impact in Israel?

Rabbi Bebe: In the last few years, Liberal Judaism has struck a chord in Israeli society, which has seen a major change since the arrival in the early 1990s of new immigrants from the former Soviet Union.

The Israeli population, which is primarily secular, is seeking a different religious approach from that offered by Orthodoxy.

Some 20 communities affiliated with the Liberal movement and 20 affiliated with the Conservative movement have been established in the last 10 years in Tel Aviv and Jerusalem. In Israel today, there are about 50 Jewish study centres affiliated with the Liberal movement.

The rift between the datim (religious) and the chilonim (secular) has favoured the emergence of a strong liberal current in Israeli society. For many Israelis, Liberal Judaism is an alternative to all or nothing.

CJN: Sephardim have traditionally resisted Liberal Judaism.

Rabbi Bebe: That is no longer true. I am the spiritual leader of a Liberal community in Paris that includes about 250 families. Fifty per cent of the members are Ashkenazi and 50 per cent are Sephardi. More and more Sephardim are joining the Liberal movement, although traditionally, the Sephardim have tended to be more Orthodox.

CJN: Why?

Rabbi Bebe: Historically, when an entire population is forced into exile, as was the case for the Jews in the Maghreb who came to France in the early '60s, they tend to withdraw into themselves.

The reverse happened in England where the Sephardi community, which arrived first, integrated and assimilated fairly quickly. In France, it was the Ashkenazi community, established there for a very long time, that assimilated and adopted a more lenient attitude towards the practice of Judaism.

On the other hand, the newly arrived Sephardi community took a stronger stand while practising the more traditional Judaism of North Africa.

Part of the Sephardi community is frustrated today. More and more Sephardim are not recognizing themselves in the religious practices they knew in their childhood. That's why some members of the community are seeking more liberal religious practices.

HAMILTON — Allen Harris, leader of the local delegation to the JCC Maccabi Games, recently received the Barry Foster Volunteer of the Year Award at the Jewish community centre's annual general meeting.

The annual award is presented to someone who is both a leader and a worker and who connects with youth, said presenter Sharon Hart, a Maccabi Games coach.

"It is extremely fitting this year that the volunteer of the year award goes to Allen Harris," Hart said.

Harris has spearheaded and led the Hamilton contingent of the JCC Maccabi Games for over 20 years, she said.

"He also is a world-class table tennis coach. He has coached our children, so that when they compete... they can do their best and excel.

"He has led children who participate in dance, golf, tennis and track and field to the Maccabi Games so they can have an incredible Jewish athletic experience with Jewish children from all over the world.

"Whatever needs to be done, Allen does it. If money needs to be raised, Allen raises it, so that every single child in our community who wants to participate can have the opportunity to do so."

In an interview, Harris said he is passionate about his work as leader of the Hamilton delegation to the JCC Maccabi Games. From the early planning stages in the fall to the weeklong event in August, he lives and breathes the games.

While Harris loves his role as administrator, he said he loves the kids most of all. Thrilled when young Hamilton athletes get medals but equally pleased when they do their best, he said he believes the games are a unique opportunity for Jewish teenagers.

"It's a great experience for them, not just from an athletic point of view, but also from a Jewish point of view," he said. "Taking part in the sport is not all that matters. They meet young athletes from all over the world. And they meet kids from their own city whom they had never met, even though they might live only two blocks away."

Nine Hamilton teenagers participated in the 2002 games. As a rule, tryouts are not necessary, unless a large number want to compete in the same sport.

"The athlete has to be competent to some degree in order to enjoy the experience," Harris said. "We wouldn't want someone to embarrass himself on the tennis court."

The JCC Maccabi Games are an international athletic competition that has been held in August in cities across North America since 1982. The event originally was held at one location, but in 2002, five cities hosted the games over a three-week span.

"The JCC Maccabi Games is the largest event of its kind," Harris said. "There is no greater gathering of Jewish youth in the world. This August, there were about 7,000 participants. That's bigger than the Winter Olympics, which involves about 2,400 athletes."

In 2003, Harris said only three host cities will be available, so fewer athletes will participate.

Linkage gone mad

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The closer we get to a possible U.S.-led war in the Middle East, the more frequently statements appear in the media linking Israel with Iraq, usually in relation to the UN.

On Feb. 24, the United States, Britain and Spain introduced a draft Security Council resolution declaring that Iraq had squandered its "final opportunity" to voluntarily disarm. But at the same time, Spain's prime minister, José Maria Aznar, told journalists that decisive action on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was necessary "from the point of view of the Arab world's understanding of certain questions, from the point of view of what it means to apply United Nations resolutions" (New York Times, Feb. 25).

So it is not surprising that former Israeli Foreign Minister Benjamin Netanyahu sent a letter to all 15 members of the European Union, warning them against creating a link between Iraq and the conflict in the Middle East. As reported by Aluf Benn in Ha'aretz on Feb. 21, Netanyahu said creating such a link "could provide [Iraqi leader] Saddam Hussein with an excuse to attack Israel, as he has done in the past."

The linkage issue was brought up on CBC Radio's "Sunday Edition," Feb. 23. In an interview with Rabbi Michael Lerner, editor of Tikkun magazine, host Michael Enright asked: "How do you counter the nexus when it is raised at some of these [anti-war] rallies, between the United States on the verge of war with Iraq and so-called Israel's imperialism, and [being] the puppet client of the U.S... When those two things are conjoined, how do you respond to that?"

Lerner is a staunch leftist critic of Israeli policies. Even though he continues to denounce both the Sharon and Bush administrations, he was blacklisted by anti-Semitic radical leftists from speaking at an anti-war demonstration the week before simply because he is a Zionist. In his criticism, he claimed, incorrectly, that Sharon's government "is cheering on the war in Iraq." In fact, Sharon and his circle have deliberately kept a low profile on the subject.

Enright drew attention to an important, worrisome development. He said, "There has been an increase in the number of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada, in Europe and probably around the world. And I'm wondering... [if] criticism of Israel has provided a certain camouflage... for people who are simply genuinely anti-Semitic and they can use that as a way of hammering home their points."

"Absolutely," Lerner replied. He recounted 2,000 years of entrenched anti-Semitism, which, he said, doesn't require much to "re-stimulate."

But his conclusion was chilling: "In fact, one of the things that I'm tremendously worried about is that, if the war doesn't go well, policy-makers who are pushing this... [will] turn around and say, you know why we did this war, we really did it to support Israel and the Jews. In other words, to put the blame on the Jewish people."

However, in response to Enright's question whether criticism of Israel comforts anti-Semites, Lerner contradicted himself, claiming that "Israeli policy is providing a basis for unfair [!] anti-Semitism around the world." It was sad to hear a rabbi, of all people, endorse the absurd view that Jewish behaviour is responsible for anti-Semitism. Call this a new linkage gone mad.

Israel's 30th government sworn in

By GIDEON ALON
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ariel Sharon presented his government to the Knesset last Thursday in a session that began at 4:30 p.m. and ended shortly after midnight.

Israel's 30th government was approved by a vote of 68-48, and the new ministers were sworn in, but coalition partner Shinui decided not to wait for the end of the speeches and the formal swearing-in ceremony and raised a toast in celebration at 10:30 p.m.

The session began with the presentation of the government by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and a speech in which he outlined the main goals of his government.

"Today, as I enter my 75th year, I have no other ambition than to lead this nation, which has known much suffering and many difficulties, which deserves so much, to a path of calm, to prosperity and to peace," Sharon said in a personal comment at the end of his speech.

He was constantly interrupted by members of the haredi parties, Shas and United Torah Judaism. Particularly vocal were outgoing minister Eli Yishai of Shas and Meir Porush of the UTJ, but Sharon ignored their interjections and went on reading his speech.

Sitting around the government horseshoe in the Knesset were a number of ministers, including Tzipi Livni, Benjamin Netanyahu, Uzi Landau and Meir Sheetrit, whose displeasure with their assignments was evident on their faces.

Ariel Sharon

Sharon tried to give his speech a statesmanlike tone, emphasizing that he considers himself beholden not only to his party but to all Israeli citizens.

"The good of the country, the common good, is what will guide us, and will be our sole focus," he said.

Three times during his speech, Sharon thanked the voters who gave the Likud twice as many seats in the Knesset as it had before the Jan. 28 election.

He also expressed regret the Labor party had not joined his coalition and said it had "not negotiated genuinely" to create a national unity government.

The prime minister complimented the parties that did agree to join his government and stressed their decision to seek out the common ground was of national importance. As an example, he cited the thousands of citizens who are not permitted to marry or divorce according to halachic law and the need to find a balanced solution to their problem.

The government's primary task will be to stabilize the economy and return the country to prosperity and growth, he said. All parts of his government share the same economic goal, he said.

"The condition of the economy demands hard and painful decisions for all of us. We will all have to contribute to this effort and everyone will have to make concessions and compromise," Sharon said.

"It will not be easy. This is not a government that was elected to make easy decisions," he added.

Sharon repeated his well-known slogan that without an end to terrorism and violence, as well as major reforms in the Palestinian Authority, including the replacement of its current leadership, there will be no negotiations.

He also repeated his promise from his previous term in office that in exchange for genuine peace, Israel will be willing to make painful concessions.

"Any political solution in the future will have to ensure the historic, security and strategic interests of Israel, and primary among them are the Palestinians' relinquishing of their excessive demand called the 'right of return' for the bringing of masses of Palestinians into Israel, the establishment of security zones, and the maintenance of the integrity and wholeness of Jerusalem," Sharon said.

Particularly irksome for the haredi parties was Sharon's promise to complete a constitution for Israel by legislating Basic Laws on rights of the individual. But he noted that passing constitutional laws requires broad political and public consensus and cannot be accomplished by force.

Focus on ties with Europe, Shalom tells Foreign Ministry

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Newly appointed Foreign Minister Silvan Shalom urged his ministry's senior officials Sunday to concentrate on improving Israel's relations with Europe.

Shalom said he intends to work intensively on the file.

"There is a feeling that we are in confrontation with Europe. This should not be taken for granted, and we must not accept the notion that Israel can get along without Europe, and that Europe can ignore Israel. This concept could have negative repercussions on the entire region," he said.

"At the moment we have a problem with Belgium, which ought not be ignored," he added, referring to a recent Supreme Court court ruling there that would allow Israelis to be tried for war crimes in Belgium in connection with their actions in the 1982 Lebanon war, but only if they are physically present and don't have diplomatic immunity.

Outlining his foreign policy goals to ministry officials, Shalom said he has a strong desire "to promote the peace process and that should be the central issue we deal with." He said other challenges include strengthening ties with the United States, which he believes are more robust than ever, and promoting relations with Arab states.

Shalom said he intends to strengthen the ministry's role in making foreign policy decisions in relation to the security establishment and Prime Minister's Office. "If things had been handled properly, and the Foreign Ministry had been more of a partner, we could have avoided problems such as that in Asia," he said, alluding to U.S. pressure that helped kill the Phalcon aircraft deal with China.

Shalom promised his door would always be open to ministry workers and scheduled a round of meetings with ministry section heads. He also invited Israel's ambassadors to the United States, Danny Ayalon, and the United Nations, Danny Gillerman, for briefings in Jerusalem.

Shalom said Israel and the United States agree that advancing the peace process is conditional on stopping terror and implementing reforms in the Palestinian Authority.

He spoke of the need to prepare for the U.S. assault on Iraq, which will probably begin within three weeks, as well as for after the war and for advancing the "road map" for resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

Release of five Iranian Jews clouded by concerns over future

By MICHAEL J. JORDAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — The release from prison of five Iranian Jews last month was due not to a change of heart by the regime in Tehran but to a political calculation that Iran's international image needs burnishing, observers say.

And clouding the relief of the Jews' relatives and advocates is concern that the men could be re-arrested at any time or subjected to other forms of harassment, at the whim of the authorities.

At the same time, U.S.-based advocates for the Jews are reminding the community that another 11 Iranian Jewish men remain unaccounted for after disappearing while allegedly trying to cross Iran's border illegally in the early 1990s.

Dani (Hamid) Tefileen after his arrest.

In addition, there have been conflicting statements as to whether the five have been permanently released.

Media reports initially said they had been released permanently, after being pardoned by Iran's supreme leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. But later reports cited Iranian officials as saying there had been no such pardon and the men had only been let out on a 10-day "holiday."

The ambiguity fits Iran's traditional treatment of its Jewish prisoners. But the question remains: Are the five free for good, or could they be returned to prison?

"It could go either way, depending on the whim of the Iranian government," said Malcolm Hoenlein, executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, which had lobbied on behalf of the Iranian Jews.

"This is why we've been warning: People should be judicious in their public statements. Just as Iran granted their release, they can revoke it."

When Iranian officials said late last month that no pardon had been granted, Tehran may have been reacting to media coverage of the release. Media reports had attributed cynical motives to the release and quoted certain activists who sounded self-congratulatory.

"No government likes to look like they're responding to outside pressure," Hoenlein said. "When you're dealing with human lives, you have to be super-sensitive to this. There's no reason for people to take credit for the releases, or to speculate about Iran's motives. We should just be happy that the five are now home with their families."

The quintet released Feb. 19 after four years in prison were merchant Dani (Hamid) Tefileen, 29, who had been sentenced to 13 years in prison; university English instructor Asher Zadmehr, 51, also sentenced to 13 years; Hebrew teacher Naser Levy Hayim, 48, sentenced to 11 years; perfume merchant Ramin Farzam, 38, sentenced to 10 years; and shopkeeper Farhad Saleh, 33, who had received an eight-year sentence.

Many factors appear to have influenced Iran's decision to release the five, who had been imprisoned with eight others on charges of spying for Israel.

The "Iran 13," as they came to be known, became a cause celebre in the Jewish community, and their plight was taken up by international diplomats after the 13 were arrested and imprisoned in January and March 1999.

Three were found innocent of the espionage charges and released. The other 10 were sentenced in July 2000 to jail terms of four to 13 years.

Of these, five had already been released after serving some or all of their time.

Earlier this year, the remaining five were released on what Iranian officials referred to as a "vacation," but they were put back in jail days before being freed again last month.

Israel has steadfastly denied the men were its spies.

The ongoing skirmishes between the hard-line clerics who run Iran and their more moderate rivals likely played a role in the latest releases, says Patrick Clawson, deputy director of the Washington Institute for Near East Policy.

Clawson also cited pressure from the European Union, a major trading partner with Iran, which said human rights abuses were hindering an expansion of economic ties.

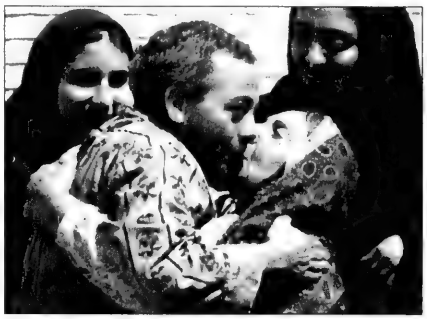
The release came on the heels of the haj, the annual pilgrimage to Islamic holy sites in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, a traditional time for rulers to demonstrate magnanimity, Clawson noted.

"I'm sure the Iranians will try to take credit for this in their negotiations" with the European Union, he said. "But that's quite unwarranted. They made these people do hard time. It's only magnanimous if you compare it to what the hard-line judiciary could have done."

Many Iranian officials had threatened the Jews with execution, a penalty Tehran reportedly has meted out to 17 Jews accused of espionage since the country's Islamic Revolution in 1979.

While pressure from the EU and the United Nations over human rights may have played a role, so, too, may have U.S. sabre-rattling against Iraq, North Korea and Iran, which President George W. Bush dubbed the "axis of evil."

"I think Iran, after several years of not paying attention to international pressure, is now taking public steps to improve its image abroad because they may not want to be a target of the war on terrorism the U.S. has launched," said Pooya Dayanim, spokesperson for the Los Angeles-based Council of Iranian American Jewish Organizations.



Asher Zadmehr being hugged by his family during his incarceration.

At the same time, Dayanim said, "This is not taking place in a vacuum; this is a little piece of a much larger picture." He noted, for example, that Iran recently lifted the death sentence on a leading dissident who had called publicly for separation of mosque and state.

Regardless of the speculation, "it's hard to assess what motivates the Iranians," Hoenlein said.

U.S. advocates tried to judge when it would be wise to publicly assail Iran for its perceived show trial and forced confessions, and when to settle for behind-the-scenes diplomacy. Of late, advocates have opted for diplomacy.

More moderate Iranian officials recognized the imprisonment of the Jews "was an injustice that cost Iran heavily in its international image," and "were looking for a way out," Hoenlein said.

Along with the uncertainty over whether Iranian officials view the latest releases as permanent or temporary, it is unclear whether relatives of the five men could join them if they are allowed to emigrate, or what persecution might await family members who stay behind.

Such factors underscore the precarious existence of the 20,000 to 25,000 Jews who remain in Iran, down from 100,000 at the time of the revolution.

Iranian authorities have made it clear they can "use any excuse, any criticism that you make, and put these people back in jail. Which is why I have not criticized the government," Dayanim said.

Remembering Bar-Ilan professor Dafna Izraeli

CJN Wire Services

RAMAT GAN, Israel — Hundreds of mourners gathered at the Kiryat Shaul Cemetery in Tel Aviv last Sunday to pay their final respects to Bar-Ilan University Prof. Dafna Izraeli, who died the previous Friday after a battle with cancer.

Prof. Izraeli, 65, was a sociologist and a leading proponent of women's rights in Israel.

Obituary

She was the founding director of the university's program in gender studies, the only graduate program of its kind in Israel. She was also founding director of the Rachel and J.L. Gewurz Center for Gender Research. Established nearly three years ago, the centre supports research in areas such as women in the labour force, women in politics and public life, changing patterns of family life, family violence and women and Halachah (Jewish law). The Gewurz Center was established with the generous support of Prof. Izraeli, her daughter and her brother, Samuel Gewurz and his wife, Brenda, of Hampstead, Quebec. With the support of the family, the university will be establishing an academic chair for research in gender studies in Prof. Izraeli's name.

In his eulogy, Bar-Ilan University president Prof. Moshe Kaveh said that Prof. Izraeli served in many circles as the spokesperson for women's rights in Israel and in the entire world. He vowed that the university would continue to pursue her life's work in order to eternalize her "spirit, vitality and vision for the advancement of feminist rights."

"I would define her as a leader," said Prof. Tova Cohen, director of the Heller Center for the Study of Women in Judaism and a close colleague.

"Most recently her leadership was directed toward starting the interdisciplinary study program at Bar-Ilan University. She regarded it as her most important mission over the last five years. She was one of the straightest and fairest people I've ever known," added Prof. Cohen, who has been appointed as the new director of the graduate program in gender studies and the Gewurz Center.

Dafna Izraeli

Mount Royal Liberal MP and professor Irwin Cotler, a close family friend, was also among the mourners.

Prof. Izraeli was born in France in 1937 and grew up in Montreal. She held a BA in political science and philosophy and an MSW in social work from McGill University and a PhD in sociology and anthropology from Manchester University in England. She served as visiting professor at New York University, Northeastern University, Harvard University and at University of California at Berkeley. Prof. Izraeli served two terms as chair of Bar-Ilan University's sociology and anthropology department.

Prof. Izraeli co-wrote six books and wrote dozens of articles on issues relating to gender in unions, work, family, social policy and the Israeli military. Her paper on Israel's first affirmative action law will be published in Women's Studies International Forum.

A tireless advocate for peace, democracy and women's rights in Israel, Prof. Izraeli was a founding member of the Israel Women's Network, an organization fighting for women's equality, the vice president of the New Israel Fund, a U.S.-Israeli organization working for peace and democracy in Israel, and was personally and professionally involved in bringing together Palestinian and Jewish women. Over the past two decades, she was an advisor to many government committees on the status of women in Israel, most recently the sub-committee on the Advancement of Women and Work and on the Economy in the Knesset Standing Committee on the Status of Women.

Prof. Izraeli and her late husband, Dove, who passed away just weeks ago, leave behind three children, Leora, Sharona and Haim, as well as 19 grandchildren, two great-grandchildren, two brothers and one sister.

Did British census undercount Jews?

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — There may be far more Jews in Great Britain than previously believed, experts say, after the release of 2001 census data this month.

The census found about 267,000 Jews in England, Scotland and Wales, slightly less than 0.5 per cent of the British population. But the religion question was voluntary and nearly a quarter of the population did not answer it.

Further, areas known to have substantial Jewish populations tended to have higher than average "no response" or "no religion" answers to the religion question, said Stanley Waterman of London's Institute for Jewish Policy Research. "Everything points to an undercount," he said.

The institute calculates there may be up to 310,000 U.K. Jews – almost 10 per cent more than the 285,000 estimate by the Board of Deputies, British Jewry's umbrella organization.

Waterman said the haredi community in particular had been undercounted. The census found just under 11,000 Jews in the London borough of Hackney, home of the country's largest haredi population. But research by the Jewish community recently suggests there are 17,000 to 22,000 Jews in the borough.

Rabbi Avraham Pinter, a former city councillor from Hackney, said many haredi Jews did not answer the religion question. "I would have thought the vast majority didn't fill it out," he said.

Many are second-generation Holocaust survivors who were concerned about disclosing their religion on a form with their name and address, he said. Also, one community newspaper discouraged haredim from answering the question, saying there was a danger in authorities having the information.

He estimated the haredi population at 17,000 to 18,000 – and said it is growing at 5 to 8 per cent a year. "All the schools are bursting at the seams. New schools are opening all the time, and they fill up immediately," he said.

The Institute for Jewish Policy Research has done studies that may help calculate the size of the undercount. Its surveys since the census found only 84 per cent of non-haredi Orthodox Jews in London and 89 per cent of Jews in the northern city of Leeds said they were Jewish on the census form.

Director Barry Kosmin said there was also an undercount among the elderly, the foreign-born and students.

Waterman estimated "50,000 to 70,000 more Jews" should be added to the census figure, which would put the number between 317,000 and 337,000.

Kosmin said there was another surprising census result: there are at least three Jews in all but one of the country's 367 local authorities. Yet, while the census turned up a startling number of rural Jews, it found fewer than expected in urban areas.

'50,000 to 70,000 more Jews' should be added to the census figure

"The major finding is that Jews aren't where you expect them to be… The most Jewish Jews, the Chassidim, didn't show up on the survey, but the Jews of the shires revealed themselves," Kosmin said, referring to rural areas.

"The Board of Deputies estimated that there were 8,000 Jews outside of the 20 main centres – and the census showed 25,000."

He said the Jews in the countryside might be be retired people or professionals who can work from home.

"The Jewish population, like the white middle class, is moving out to the countryside – these stories you hear about accountants and artists leaving the city and converting a barn into a home, there are a lot of Jews doing it," he said.

But Kosmin said rural Jews could not all be people who have left cities. He said some might be intermarried or might consider themselves ethnically but not religiously Jewish.

The Israeli Embassy in London has accused a British newspaper of perpetuating the blood libel against Jews over a recent cartoon depicting Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon eating a baby.

The cartoon in the Independent showed Sharon crouched in the ruins of a village, biting the head off a baby as helicopters overhead broadcast the message "Vote Sharon."

"What's wrong… You never seen a politician kissing babies before?" Sharon asks in the drawing.

The embassy filed its complaint via lawyer Anthony Julius, who defended scholar Deborah Lipstadt when Holocaust denier David Irving sued her for libel in in 2000.

"The cartoon associates [Sharon], a Jew, with a particularly dreadful crime allegedly committed by Jews – indeed, habitually and exclusively by Jews. It associates him with the blood libel," Julius argued.

The Press Complaints Commission has received some 30 complaints about the cartoon since its publication Jan. 27, Holocaust Memorial Day in Britain and the day before Israel's general election, a commission spokesperson said.

The Board of Deputies, the umbrella group of British Jewry, was among the first to lodge a protest. The commission has yet to respond, a board spokesperson said.

But two other complaints have already been rejected because they did not come from Sharon, the object of the cartoon. "The commission cannot take up a third-party complaint," the commission spokesperson said, adding the commission has asked the embassy whether it's acting on Sharon's behalf.

The Independent's editor-in-chief, Simon Kelner – who is Jewish – wouldn't speak to JTA. But he told London's Jewish Chronicle newspaper: "I am Jewish myself, so I would be sensitive to anything anti-Semitic. This was a very powerful cartoon and it is clearly anti-Sharon. However, that is very different [from] being anti-Semitic."

The cartoonist, Dave Brown, has said he didn't intend to be anti-Semitic or anti-Israel. "I sought only to target a man and a party I consider to be actively working against peace."

Gaza incursions meant to stop Hamas

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Mideast Analysis

Israel has adopted a tough new policy toward the Gaza Strip, a hotbed of Palestinian militancy.

As Palestinians in Gaza have escalated their mortar and Qassem rocket attacks against Israeli towns and settlements of late, Israel has responded with much greater military force.

In the wake of Israel's latest raid into Gaza on Feb. 23 – a 24-hour strike into the northern town of Beit Hanoun – Israel's defence minister, Shaul Mofaz, announced Israel will step up pressure on the Palestinians, particularly Hamas, the Islamic Resistance Movement.

Mofaz suggested the Israeli army might well seize the commanding heights around Beit Hanoun in order to head off the looming threat of mortar and rocket attacks.

But he ruled out the prospect of a reoccupation of Gaza, an idea he first broached in January.

Israel's latest raids were foreshadowed by a stern warning Prime Minister Ariel Sharon issued last summer.

Sharon told the Palestinians that Israel would not hesitate to launch a "massive operation" into Gaza, on the scale of last spring's Operation Defensive Shield in the West Bank, if there was not a radical improvement in the situation.

Restrained, perhaps, by the United States, Israel held back, choosing instead to continue with pinprick raids into Gaza, a practice begun shortly after the the intifadah started in September 2000.

These incursions, though costly to the Palestinians in terms of levelled buildings and shattered lives, did not deter Hamas from firing more mortars and Qassems into Sderot, a town in the western Negev close to Sharon's ranch, and at Israeli settlements in Gaza.

Hamas began firing Qassems – a fairly primitive rocket with a range of 7.5 kilometres and manufactured in metal working shops in Gaza – to circumvent the fortified fence around Gaza.

Israel built the fence in the mid-1990s, shortly after the Oslo peace process got under way.

The fence has been a success, having staunched the flow of suicide bombers from Gaza into Israel.

Stymied by the fence, as well as by constant army patrols, Hamas took to firing rockets and mortars at Sderot and Jewish settlements from positions in northern Gaza.

The barrages have caused property damage, but claimed no lives.

Determined to put an end to them, Israel launched its first big incursion into Gaza in April 2001. The raid drew an angry reaction from the United States, and Israel promptly withdrew.

But since then, the Bush administration has virtually refrained from criticizing such raids, provided they are of short duration and cause minimal casualties.

Emboldened by Washington's virtual silence, Israel, in the past few months, has launched six major raids into Gaza, deploying tanks, armoured personnel carriers and helicopters. Israel's objectives are twofold: to destroy the metal working shops producing the rockets and mortars and to disrupt Hamas' terrorist infrastructure.

Israel launched its latest cycle of incursions on Oct. 7, thrusting into Khan Yunis. Condemned by United Nations Secretary-General Kofi Annan, the raid resulted in the deaths of 16 Palestinians, including 11 killed by a missile fired from a helicopter gunship.

On Dec. 6, Israel hit the Bureij refugee camp, during which 10 Palestinians were killed.

On Jan. 26, after 10 Qassems landed in Sderot, Israel penetrated Gaza City in its biggest sweep into Gaza since the outbreak of the intifadah, killing 13 Palestinians.

On Feb. 19, following the destruction of an Israeli tank with four soldiers in northern Gaza, Israel swept into Gaza City yet again, killing 11 Palestinians, including a suicide bomber who tried to blow up a tank.

On Feb. 23, after Israel divided Gaza into three parts to prevent the movement of Qassems between northern and southern Gaza, Israeli troops poured into Beit Hanoun.

Mofaz described it as an "open-ended" raid, but within 24 hours, Israel had pulled out.

Over the weekend, Israeli armour stormed back into the Bureij camp, destroying buildings and killing eight Palestinians.

One can safely assume Israel will be back in Gaza, given Hamas' reluctance to cease its operations and the failure by both sides to reach a lasting ceasefire.

Holocaust compared to animal slaughter

"Our expectation is that Canadians would be appalled at making these analogies. I hope vegetarian groups and human rights groups would denounce it if it crosses the border."

Prutschi said the display "is reflective of some of the elements on the extreme end of the animal rights movement, and clearly what they're trying to do is exploit for publicity's sake what is an obscene analogy."

Abraham Foxman, national director of the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League (ADL) and a Holocaust survivor, said "the effort by PETA to compare the deliberate, systematic murder of millions of Jews to the issue of animal rights is abhorrent. PETA's effort to seek 'approval' for their 'Holocaust on Your Plate' campaign is outrageous, offensive and takes chutzpah to new heights."

The ADL noted the use of Holocaust imagery by PETA is part of a "disturbing development that has emerged in some animal and environmental activist circles."

Meat.org, an anti-meat eating Web site, presents an "Animal Holocaust" section that includes pictures of animals with the caption, "Holocaust victim," and it explicitly compares the murder of Jews to the slaughter of animals.

Similar parallels were drawn by the Northwest Animal Rights Network in Seattle while a magazine, Animals' Agenda, employed cover art in its March/April 2002 issue that depicts Jews in wooden barracks in a concentration camp alongside photos of chickens in cages.

Food, Scrumptious Food

A healthy way to warm your days

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Parents can always find something to worry about. We easily feel guilty if our children do not consume the mandated daily five to eight servings of fruits and vegetables.

The task sometimes seems easier in summer, when seasonal plums, peaches and watermelon, etc. turn up in the market. But fibre- and vitamin-packed fruits and veggies (oh, do I hate that word!) are no less vital in the winter. It just takes more ingenuity to get them in.

Solution? Greet the family with big pots of homemade soup to warm them up as soon as they walk through the door. Be creative: these recipes are not cast in concrete: go ahead and add the last few spoonfuls of leftover salad (place in a strainer to rinse out the dressing), add that half a can of tomatoes lurking in the fridge, and of course, add any forgotten more-or-less-neutral-tasting zucchini or kohlrabi quickly going south in the vegetable bin.

I must admit that I have no patience for any soup recipe calling for a roux. I have never mastered the flour-fat-liquid routine. So to thicken my soup, I always use my trusty immersion blender.

Let your soup cool and then puree half or more of the vegetables. This way, if you are in a hurry, you needn't chop them into uniform or even small pieces before cooking. Plus, some of the vegetables can remain anonymous. Be sure to concentrate when you are immersion-blending, and make sure the soup is cool so you don't get hot soup spattered all over.

POTATO-CELERY SOUP

6 stalks celery
1 medium onion
2 lb. potatoes
1½ tbsp. vegetable oil
4 cups water
1½ tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper

Scrub, trim and check celery. Peel onion. Chop both finely. Peel and cube potatoes. Heat oil in a large soup pot. Add celery and onion and sauté for 5 minutes.

Add cubed potatoes. Continue to sauté for a few minutes. Add water and bring to a boil. Add salt and pepper. Cover and lower heat. Simmer for 15-20 minutes or until potatoes are thoroughly cooked. Cool.

Puree about half of the soup with an immersion blender. Reheat. Yield: 8-10 bowls of soup.

BUTTERNUT SQUASH-CORN SOUP

6 cups peeled, chopped butternut or acorn squash (about 2 lbs.)
1 large onion, diced
1 tbsp. vegetable oil
10 cups water, or chicken or vegetable stock
½ cup quick-cooking oatmeal, checked
1 (10-oz.) can corn, well-drained salt and pepper
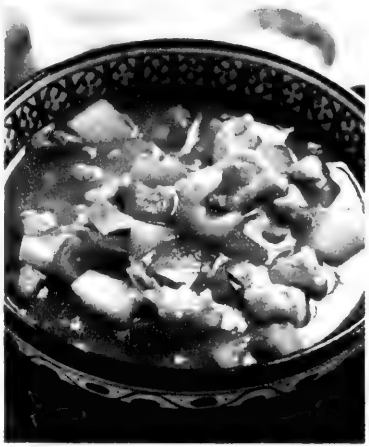
snipped chives (optional)

Mix diced squash, onion and oil in a large, non-stick soup pot. Cover and saute over low heat until onion is tender but not brown, stirring frequently – about 12 minutes.

Add 10 cups of water or stock, increase heat to high and bring mixture to boil. Lower heat, cover and simmer until squash is tender – about 20 minutes.

Let mixture cool and puree with immersion blender. Stir in oatmeal and corn. Bring to a boil. If soup becomes too thick, add 1-2 cups of water. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Ladle into soup bowls and sprinkle with snipped chives. Yield: about 12-15 bowls of soup.



LENTIL-VEGETABLE SOUP

4 cups brown lentils, sorted
10 cups water
2 tsp. salt
2 medium onions, chopped
4 medium carrots, cleaned and peeled if necessary
3 medium zucchini, cleaned and peeled if necessary
1 tsp. dried basil
3 oz. tomato paste
black pepper
soy sauce (optional)

In a large soup pot, place lentils, water and salt. Bring to a boil. Lower heat and simmer, partially covered, for 20 minutes. Crush vegetables in a food processor or chop finely. Add to lentil mixture, along with basil, and simmer for an additional 20-30 minutes.

Stir in tomato paste. Season to taste with black pepper. Serve piping hot. Let diners add a few drops of soy sauce at their own discretion. Yield: 10-12 servings.

Start baking for Purim

The Jewish Theological Seminary has sent along the following recipes for Purim, which this year is celebrated on the 14th of Adar, March 18.

Based on the Book of Esther, the festival of Purim is a celebration of the Jewish people's triumph over hatred and adversity. To participate in this festival, we are commanded to eat, drink and be merry… and do not forget to rattle your gragger when you hear the evil Haman's name recited in Megillat Esther.

NO-BAKE PURIM MISHLOACH MANOT COOKIES

1 package plain wafer cookies
1 can frosting
optional: 2 different kinds of each of the above and sprinkles

Make cookie sandwiches using the cookies (as the bread) and the frosting (as the filling). For a fancier look, add a dab or thin layer of frosting to the top and decorate with the sprinkles.

HAMANTASCHEN

The cookie dough can also be used as crusts for two fruit pies.

Dough
¼ cup light brown sugar
1 cup softened margarine
2 medium eggs
½ cup corn oil
4 cups flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
½ tsp.salt

Filling:
Fruit spread or commercial prune butter

Preheat oven to 350. Cream the sugar and margarine. Add the eggs and oil and beat until completely blended. Stir in the flour, baking powder and salt to form dough. Since the dough will be too soft to handle easily, roll it in cylinders approximately 3 inches in diameter and freeze.

Using one cylinder of dough at a time (keeping the unused ones frozen until needed); cut dough into ⅛-in. thick slices. Roll each slice to flatten it slightly; put 1 tsp. filling in the centre of each round and draw the three sides together to form a triangle. (The dough will be soft and will need careful handling.) Place the triangles on ungreased cookie sheets and bake them for 20 minutes or until they are golden brown.

Lipson Tea

Shelly Lipson scrutinized each page in the costume catalogue. She just had to win first place in the Purim costume contest this year. For the past two years, she had gotten second place. Her dinosaur costume had been SO good. She had sewn it herself. She couldn't believe the judges could have been so shortsighted as to give first place to Ariella with her store-bought costume.

"Imma, could I get this princess costume? 'Comes with tiara, sceptre, and cape.' And look at the beautiful lacy dress! Only $59.99!"

"Shelly, we're not spending $60 for something you're only going to wear once. Why don't you make your own costume like you did last year? You're very creative and talented, and I'm sure you can come up with something great! Come into the kitchen now, lunch is ready."

Shelly reluctantly put down the catalogue and joined her mother.

"Shelly, could you make me a cup of tea?"

Shelly went to the pantry to get a tea bag. I'll never be able to think of a costume that could win a contest. What am I going to do? She opened the box of Lipton tea...Lipton Tea? I could take a big cardboard box and colour it like this. I can make myself into Shelly Lipson Tea!

* * * * *

After covering a large cardboard box with kraft paper, Shelly painstakingly began copying the Lipton Tea box, substituting Lipson for Lipton. Three hours later, she was done. Her mother helped her cut holes in the box so she could wear it. Shelly studied her creation. She was going to win with this. She had to.

* * * * *

Mrs. Abusera stood by the outdoor stage with her megaphone. "Okay, third, fourth and fifth grade girls, come up on stage. Let's see your pretty costumes." Shelly couldn't believe it. It was starting to rain. She watched in horror as the Crayola washable marker-work on her costume began to streak and blotch. Numbly, she began walking onto the stage with the rest of her class. She stared at Ariella's costume. It was a dinosaur, like Shelly herself had worn last year. Except instead of being handmade, it looked store-bought. The rain was falling harder now.

"Everybody inside!" shouted Mrs. Abusera. "We'll finish the judging there."

The drenched girls fled into the auditorium. One by one, the papers peeled off the soggy cardboard of Shelly's former costume. Shelly started crying. Ariella's gonna win, with her stupid dinosaur costume.

Mrs. Abusera spoke up. "The judges have deliberated. The winner is...." Shelly looked down at her shredded costume, so no one could see her crying. "Ariella Gold, for her BEAUTIFUL dragon costume."

Shelly felt a comforting arm around her shoulder. It was Ariella. "You really had the best costume. Lipson Tea — that was a super idea. I wish I was half as talented as you."

Did Ariella really mean that?

"Do you know why I was a dinosaur this year? 'Cause I liked your dinosaur costume so much last year."

Shelly stared at Ariella in disbelief. Ariella continued, "Look what I won, Shelly. A $20 gift certificate to Marco's Magic Shop. Let's share the prize."

The beautiful dinosaur and the soggy cardboard box strode off the stage arm in arm.

Former Torontonian runs film festival in Asia

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Howard Elias had never been to a Jewish film festival, but that didn't stop him from founding one in Hong Kong three years ago.

"How difficult can it be?" thought the Toronto native, a resident of the bustling Asian metropolis since 1995.

Elias, now 44, found his interest piqued when he heard that the film Left Luggage was being shown at another festival in Hong Kong.

"It was shown on a Shabbos," he recalled in a phone interview. "I thought, 'Why is it we never hear about these [films of Jewish interest]?' That was the seed that started it all."

Originally, Elias, who has an MBA from McMaster University, wanted to organize a Jewish cultural festival with film screenings and live performances, but after drawing up a business plan and realizing the cost would be prohibitive, he decided to narrow his focus to the film aspect.

Starting with an Internet search, he located films that "looked interesting" and set out to find sponsors and generate publicity. A radio interviewer that first year gave him pause for a moment, asking what his theme would be. "I hadn't thought of a theme. I said I didn't want to have a theme my first year."

Howard Elias

With characteristic attention to detail, Elias added a theme to the list of items he wanted to fine-tune for the following year. The theme for this year's festival, scheduled for Nov. 22 to 30, will be Jewish comedy.

His budget – underwritten in large part by members of the local Jewish community and embassies of countries where the films originated – has allowed him to bring in a modest number of speakers and to stage a klezmer concert in conjunction with the 2002 festival, which had a music theme.

The opening night speaker at the first festival was American filmmaker Lisa Lewenz, whom Elias happened to see on Oprah. Raised Episcopalian, Lewenz eventually discovered that her father was Jewish and found film footage of Nazi Germany shot by her late grandmother, which she used in her documentary, A Letter Without Words. After hearing her compelling story, Elias immediately tracked her down by phone.

Lewenz' film was the first of nine that Elias screened that year. The festival, now housed in Hong Kong's Cine-Art House (a theatre specializing in non-mainstream films), has since grown to about two dozen movies per year. It is the only one of its kind in the Asia-Pacific region.

Elias watches about 100 films a year, looking for works that will appeal to a younger audience than at similar festivals in North America, and one that is 25 per cent non-Jewish.

As a minority in Hong Kong's predominantly Chinese population of seven million, Elias has encountered stereotyping of Jews but not hostility. "They think [Jews] are rich and smart and good in business."

Hong Kong's Jewish community, estimated at between 3,000 and 5,000 people, boasts five congregations – four Orthodox and one Reform.

"We have such a wonderful community," Elias said. "This is my family here." From the first time he walked into Ohel Leah Synagogue – an elegant, century-old Orthodox congregation – he knew it was the place for him.

Elias grew up in a traditional Jewish home and was active in United Synagogue Youth, the youth movement affiliated with Conservative Judaism, where he was one of the first Canadians to serve on its international board.

He became less observant as an undergraduate at the University of Toronto, where he took one film course for an easy credit, but today he describes himself as "Orthodox with Conservative tendencies."

His connection to the Far East dates back to his days as a one-year exchange student in Japan in 1983. After eight years back in Toronto, Elias missed Asia and bought a one-way ticket to Taiwan, where he studied Mandarin until – as he puts it – he was fluent enough to explain the difference between simple and compound interest.

In Hong Kong, he has worked for two telecommunications companies and as a management consultant. Now he is senior manager of Human Resources at the German Swiss International School, but at least a couple of hours a week are devoted to the festival – up to eight hours a day as opening night approaches.

Yiddish classics get the DVD treatment

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

The DVD revolution is finally leaving its mark in the world of "Yiddish" films.

Four classic Yiddish films have recently been released on DVD. Not only do they provide excellent audio and video, they cost less than the same films on VHS cassette.

The four movies, Yidl Mitn Fidl, Mamele, A Brivele Der Mamen and Der Purimshpiler, were filmed on location in Poland between 1936 and 1938 by the late Joseph Green.

The recent release of these films on DVD by Ergo Media coincides with both Ergo Media's 15th anniversary as one of the leading suppliers of Jewish oriented videos and with the 65th anniversary of the completion of the original Joseph Green films.

Each of the titles in this latest release includes interactive menus, scene access, an introduction by Yiddish film historian Dr. Eric Goldman, audio interviews with Joseph Green and some of the actors from the films, a nostalgic photo gallery, a bio and filmography and much more.

Dr. Eric Goldman, the founder and head of Ergo Media, worked together with Joseph Green on the restoration of these films 25 years ago and is considered an expert on Yiddish cinema and brings this expertise to these releases.

Having viewed two of these DVDs recently, I can say that the picture and sound are the best I've ever seen on these films, although it must be remembered that the quality of DVD can only be as good as the original copies of these films themselves.

Eye on Arts

NEW WORK OF SHTETL FICTION FROM SASKATOON AUTHOR MARTHA BLUM

Martha Blum, who has lived in Saskatoon for nearly half a century, was born in 1913 in Czernowitz (now Chernivtski, Ukraine). Her first novel, The Walnut Tree, was a sort of love story, set against many of the historical events – the invasions, the war, the camps, the persecutions – that coloured the author's early life. The book was published four years ago by Regina-based Coteau Book, and received considerable critical acclaim.

Now Blum, who teaches musical-text interpretation to performers and is a founding member of the Saskatoon Opera Association, has written a second work of fiction. Children of Paper is set in Suczorno, a Jewish village in turn-of-the-century rural Ukraine, and is populated by Old World-style characters of the sort that Blum must have known in her childhood.

Fans of Blum may well find much to admire in this quasi-novel from the octogenarian, to whom we wish many more years of productive writing. (Coteau, $18.95)

Names in the News: Dr. David G. Roskies, the Montreal-born professor of Jewish literature at the Jewish Theological Seminary in New York, was recently recruited by the National Yiddish Book Centre of Amherst, Mass., to direct an international team of nine scholars in the translation into English and editing of a series of Yiddish titles to be published by Yale University Press.

The series, known as the New Yiddish Library, will include never-before-translated works such as Itzik Manger's The Megillah, new translations of the comic works of Sholom Aleichem and Sholem Asch's historical novel Salvation (to be released under its original title, The Sayer of Psalms). Twenty-four volumes are planned.

CD merges two worlds of music

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Singer, songwriter and musician Allan Soberman has produced a CD that merges traditional Jewish music with popular secular music.

He says his recently released CD, Searching for my Voice, "merges the two worlds of music that I knew as a younger person."

Soberman, 52, is a self-taught musician who grew up with Jewish music. His late father, Cantor Morris Soberman, was the ba'al koreh, chazzan sheini and bar and bat mitzvah teacher at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue for more than 35 years.

Soberman convinced his father to buy him a guitar when he was 12 years old and played the violin at Vaughan Road Collegiate.

"That was when I became fascinated with pop and folk music and performers like The Beatles, Peter Paul and Mary and the early rock 'n' roll."

He received a business and commerce degree at the University of Toronto and played with bar mitzvah bands "to get me through college."

He started his musical career as a bassist/vocalist with folk acts in the early 1970s and went on the road as an accompanist playing full time with folk groups such as Stringband and award-winning performers, including Dan Hill and Nancy White.

Soberman wrote scores for films while he continued his musical career, playing with groups that opened for performers Billy Crystal, Billy Joel, J.J. Cale, the Paul Butterfield Blues Band and others.

"I commuted frequently to Nashville in the early 1980s to co-write with many veteran hit songwriters. I was also doing vocal sessions for various artists, such as Sylvia Tyson, and singing on commercials for companies like MacDonald's, Labatts and Kraft."

After his father's death in 1999, Soberman began searching for records and tapes of music and lessons his father had made.

As a tribute to his father, in 2001, he created a CD titled A Dedication, which included many of his father's traditional songs and prayers – Friday night services and Megillah trope, along with Maftir and Haftorah selections with all the brachot.

Allan Soberman

Recently, he recorded a revised version of the traditional Friday evening song, Shalom Aleichem, which his family sang around the Sabbath evening dinner table.

After receiving encouraging responses from friends and colleagues, he decided to complete an entire CD – Searching for my Voice – which he says "is taking traditional melodies and creating a unique contemporary setting for them.

"In order to maintain the intimate connection to my father, I performed all the parts on the CD, playing all the instruments and layering many vocal and counter-vocal parts in order to create a very large choir effect."

The CD has 12 selections including Shalom Aleichem, Adon Olam and a Havdalah service.

"I am delighted that world music stations throughout the United States, across Canada, and in France, Belgium and Croatia, are already playing selections from Searching for my Voice," Soberman says.

In an interview, the single father of two, Heather, 21, and Andrew, 19, both students at McGill University, said he is looking forward to playing live concerts of the melodies on his new CD as well as other arrangements.

Searching for my Voice is available on the Web at www.sobermanmusic.com, and at Judaica and gift shops.

Yiddish classes get DVD treatment

But if you want the best available home video copies of these films, these DVDs are the way to go.

Yidl Mitn Fidl stars Molly Picon as a young woman who poses as a man in order to join a band of traveling musicians. She falls in love with one of the other men in the group in one of the greatest Yiddish films of all time.

Mamele also features Molly Picon, who this time plays the daughter of a widower who must take care of the house and the entire family of seven.

A Brivele Der Mamen focuses on the efforts of one Jewish mother to save her family in the aftermath of World War I. It stars Lucy and Misha Gehrman and Edmund Zayenda.

Der Purimshpiler is about a drifter who falls in love with a shoemaker's daughter. It features Miriam Kressyn and Zygmund Turkow.

Alluring title, but disappointing book

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

Books

It's intriguing when a critic more accustomed to offering an opinion than to receiving one becomes a novelist.

Give Globe and Mail theatre critic Kate Taylor credit for making that leap. She began her first novel, Madame Proust and the Kosher Kitchen (Doubleday, 414 pages, $34.95), more than seven years ago – a far cry from the few hours it takes her to write an average review.

Madame Proust and the Kosher Kitchen tells the story of three women in three different eras: Jeanne Proust, formerly Jeanne Weil, the mother of French writer Marcel Proust; Marie Prévost, who in the novel is translating into English Jeanne Proust's diary in Paris' Bibliothèque Nationale; and Sarah Bensimon, a Parisian refugee sent to Canada as a 12-year-old to escape the Nazis.

As Marie translates the diary, Jeanne Proust's obsessive worries about her son and her accounts of late-19th century French society and the Dreyfus Affair, are increasingly interrupted by Marie's own thoughts and experiences growing up in Paris and Montreal in the 1970s and '80s and her unrequited love for Max. Max, we learn, is the son of the grown Sarah, who was orphaned by the war and grew up in Toronto with her foster parents.

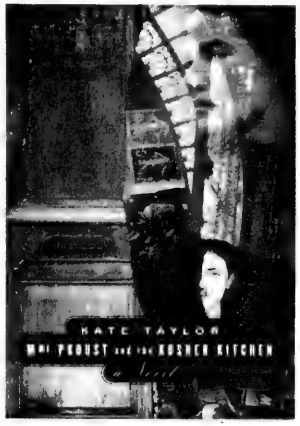
Sarah never gets over the loss of her parents, and when she marries and lives in her own home, she spends much of her time in the kitchen, recreating the French foods of her childhood in an attempt to bring her past back to life.

Taylor has interwoven the three storylines into a densely packed, ambitious novel full of intricate historic details and large themes, including language and interpretation, history and memory, love and loss.

Her starting point, she told The CJN, was Marcel Proust and his seminal work, A la recherche du temps perdu, which had a strong influence on her in high school in Ottawa. She recalled reading about the moment the author dipped a piece of French sponge cake, called a madeleine, into a cup of herbal tea, and through its smell and taste, he was transported immediately back to his childhood.

From there, it was a logical step toward Sarah's attempts to rekindle her lost childhood through homecooked meals. In fact, Taylor said, the book's title, with its reference to a kosher kitchen, came to her fairly early in the writing process.

"I liked the weird juxtaposition," she said.



Taylor made more connections.

"Proust's mother reminded me of people like Sarah, with their Holocaust or war survivors' anxieties" and experiences of "the dislocations of war," she said. These individuals "couldn't accept that things were OK."

In the novel, the Holocaust also plays a large role in Marie's life, as she grapples with her feelings for Max, the son of a survivor and the man she hopes will be her husband.

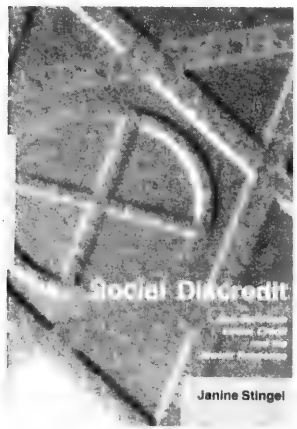
Social Credit, anti-Semitism and the Jewish response

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Norman Jaques, a former Social Credit MP from Alberta, earned a special place in the annals of Canadian anti-Semitism 60 years ago when he wrote a virulently anti-Semitic letter on House of Commons letterhead, thus tarring two reputable institutions with a single brush.

In the summer of 1943, as the Nazi Holocaust was raging in Europe, Jaques extolled the fraudulent Protocols of the Elders of Zion for its truthfulness and complained, much like the David Ahenakews of today, that the Jews maintain a complete stranglehold over the news media.

As Janine Stingel writes in her book, Social Discredit: Anti-Semitism, Social Credit and the Jewish Response, Jaques was "long considered to be the most notorious anti-Semite in the Social Credit movement and used his parliamentary privilege in the House of Commons to oppose international political Zionism vehemently."



For this reason Jaques was eventually marginalized by party members such as Ernest Manning, who would become Alberta's premier, and who would watch a generation later as his son, Preston, attempted to remove anti-Semitic fringe elements from his own Reform political party.

Stingel, an Albertan with a PhD in history from McGill University, became motivated to learn everything she could about Canada's Social Credit party and its shameful dalliance with anti-Semitism while she was attending high school in her small village of Alix, in central Alberta, almost 20 years ago.

One day, a school superintendent attended some classes at her tiny school. Only later did she realize it was in reaction to the discovery that Alberta teacher Jim Keegstra, from nearby Eckville, had been teaching "bad things" about Jews.

A few years after Keegstra's hate crimes conviction, Stingel wrote a college history paper on him and others like him, and the impulse for the current book was born.

Social Discredit outlines the intermingled careers and activities of such people as party founder William "Bible Bill" Aberhart, who led the party to a landslide victory, and economist C. H. Douglas, who for years disseminated pamphlets about an international Jewish financial conspiracy.

Other party members included Ron Gostick, who later moved to Flesherton, Ont., and acquired a reputation as "one of Canada's most notorious anti-Semites," and Solon Low, who continued to espouse anti-Semitism even after Ernest Manning's purge of the party in 1947-48.

Stingel focuses on the Jewish response, and details the early activities of the Canadian Jewish Congress as it slowly adopted an aggressive approach to countering anti-Semitism and other forms of race hatred in the postwar era. Contributions by Sam Bronfman, Rabbi Abraham Feinberg, Sam Jacobs, Ben Kayfetz, David Rome, Louis Rosenberg and others are duly noted.

Business Profile

Investment guru goes against the grain

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

As a contrarian, Benj Gallander fits the part well. He is the antithesis of an investment adviser. He carries no cellphone, wears no watch, writes plays and is working on a novel.

Did I say investment adviser? He's not really that either. Gallander, 45, is the co-editor, along with Ben Stadelman, of Contra the Heard, a limited subscription quarterly newsletter that provides stock news, trends and performance results of stocks they currently own.

Gallander is a former investment columnist for the Globe and Mail, and has written several books, including The Uncommon Investor and his latest, The Contrarian Investor's 13: How To Earn Superior Returns In The Stock Market (Viking Canada).

Contra has among the highest investment returns, both short-term and long-term, in North America. Their 10-year annualized return is 25.4 per cent, and his one-year return is 64.8 per cent.

Gallander's secret is going against the grain – being a contrarian.

"A lot of people think a contrarian always goes against the herd – that's not really what it means," Gallander explains.

"When I buy stock, I'm going against the tide and then, over time [the crowd follows me and] we all end up swimming together. At some point, it's time to go off on my own."

For example, despite the dot-com crash, Gallander bought stocks in three tech companies last December. "Over the course of the next few years, people will join me, and I'll pick an auspicious time to jump out."

Doing well on the stock market takes a lot of self-discipline, research and a basic understanding of history and human nature.

"We see the same pattern emerging again and again," Gallander says, adding the recent tech stock bust is nothing new.

Back in the 17th century, Dutch investors saw their tulip stocks dive 93 per cent. Britain's first experiment in the stock market saw the famous South Sea shares crash in 1720. And in the late 1980s, the real estate market took a nose dive.

"The stock market is like a pendulum that swings too far one way and then the other," he says. "At each extreme, people are out of touch with the real value of a stock. The market gets depressed because people get depressed."

Understanding that stocks are often under or overvalued is the key to making smart investment decisions, Gallander says.

"In the late '80s, a friend told me to buy a house then or I'd never be able to afford one. My reaction was that prices were too high. I knew they had to come down."

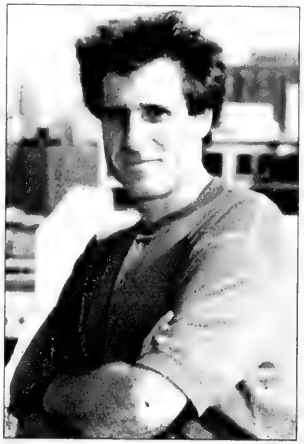
The Contrarian Investor's 13 gives 13 rules an independent investor needs to know about the contrarian approach to the market.

Many of them, as you would imagine, run contrary to what many investment analysts advise.

Such as Rule number 2: recognize that conventional risk-reward relationships are often bogus.

"Some people think risk-reward is a constant: more risk equals more reward and vice versa," Gallander says. "I don't think it's a constant at all. The risk-reward relationship is often out of whack.

"I see more risk when a stock has a high price – it has further to fall. A Nortel stock at $1 is much less risk than a $100 stock."



Benj Gallander

As he explains in his book: "There is a time to panic. The key to panicking is to do so before the throngs do, and slither away quietly before any alarm bells are set off. When the masses panic, they tend to do so almost in unison, and valuations tumble in a hurry."

This is an oft-repeated mantra. Gallander believes in buying and selling before the masses do.

"Being a contrarian allows me to target such huge gains – I get to buy at a huge discount and sell at good value."

This can only be done by studying the history of a stock. Stocks that have done well in the past are likely to do so again, he says. This allows Gallander to set a target price for a stock based on its past performance. When a stock reaches the target, he decides whether to sell or hold.

Remember the lesson of the pendulum, he advises. "When we buy stock and target it at 200 per cent growth, we know it has spent a lot of time at [a high] level. We aren't expecting it to do something it hasn't done before."

Another lesson is that nothing draws a crowd like a crowd.

"People listen to friends who say, 'The stock's doing great for me – you should buy some,'" Gallander says. "It's like people looking up at a tall building because others are. Maybe it's a 'belonging' instinct. I don't know."

Another of Gallander's rules is rule number 9: search for the beautiful black swans – and avoid most blue chip stocks.

"Some blue chip stocks can be good, but a lot of them can be overvalued," he says. "A lot of people only invest in blue chips and this creates a big demand. The stocks trade at a higher value and in a recession come down a higher percentage.

"I look for the ugly black swans that will become the next white swans. It is hard to make a lot of money on things everybody else likes."

In short there's only so much money to go around on a particular stock.

He explains further in his book: "Many advisers focus on investing in the current darlings of the stock market, the 'beautiful white swans' that are the current belles of the ball. However, except in extraordinary circumstances, most 'beautiful' stocks do not become much more exquisite, as their upside potential is limited given the dramatic ride already experienced."

When buying, Gallander studies a stock's performance over a 10-year period to see if it meets the following criteria: its value must have dropped at least 33 per cent in the preceding 52 weeks; it must have been actively traded for at least 10 years; it must have traded at a much higher price for a majority of that time; and it must be under $25.

When a company is decided on, he contacts the company, obtains financial reports and sees whether it has met its targets in the past.

"Then we'll wait a minimum of six months – often three to five years before buying.

"This way we get to know the company that much better," he says. "When we buy the stock, it's close to the time when the stock's going to move upwards."

There are many other little tips in his book, such as buying the majority of stock in a 10-day buying spree in December (when a lot of stocks are unloaded for tax reasons), and selling stocks at prices that end in a four or a nine (as in $13.84 or $22.69). The latter stems from the fact most people price stocks to sell at round numbers that end in fives and zeros. Gallander feels that aiming one penny under helps to ensure a sale.

Other rules in his book include: diversify but beware the devil of overdiversification, and practice patience. He also explains the concepts of averaging up and averaging down; how to calculate a firm's book value; how to understand income statements and balance sheets; how to set a sale price; the pros and cons of full service brokers versus discount brokers, and much more.

The National Post recently said about Gallander: "If all the world's a stage, then [he] is one of the stock market's greatest characters."

This is an apt metaphor given Gallander's other love – drama. (Not to, incidentally, forget his true love, his toddler Caellum).

Gallander is the founder of SummerWorks Theatre Festival in Toronto, one of Canada's largest theatre festivals. He has written many plays that have been produced, including Death of Parent God and Dark Ages Romance.

Gallander has also travelled extensively, often mixing business and pleasure. He has worked in Nepal, Czechoslovakia, France and Israel. Between 2000 and 2002 he wrote a bi-weekly investment column for the Globe and Mail. He also writes for Canadian MoneySaver and Bloomberg news service.

In 2001, Gallander was selected to spend the summer at the Pierre Berton House in the Yukon, where, as the sole writer in retreat, he began work on his yet-to-be-completed novel.

"Writing plays gives me a better understanding of human psychology," he says. "A lot of people separate the world of arts and business. People who only focus on business allow money to become their god. That's something I hope to avoid."

Community offers variety of services for elderly

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Through the individual and co-operative efforts of several organizations, particularly the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care, Circle of Care and the Bernard Betel Centre, the Jewish community of Toronto has extensive and generally affordable services for the elderly.

The agencies may work together, such as in providing palliative care and meals on wheels; or offer parallel services – home care, for example. But they all face the challenge of a growing senior population, government-mandated reduction of services and the need for innovation in planning, organizing and distributing service.

Bernard Betel Centre, Senior Care among Jewish agencies

The Bernard Betel Centre, located on Steeles Avenue just west of Bathurst Street, is intended to be a learning and wellness centre, according to its executive director Esta Wall.

"We want to maximize the independence of seniors, so that they can continue to live in their homes and keep healthy and active," Wall told The CJN.

Wall said the centre recognizes that seniors are not homogeneous in their needs or interests. For that reason, services include a kosher cafeteria, offering "subsidized, gourmet meals," meals on wheels, a carpentry program, films, lectures and a telephone contact program, as well as the only free visiting companion program in the city.

In the companion program, a volunteer, often a university student, goes into a home where a housebound older person lives, and talks or plays chess while the caregiver has some free time.

The centre has the largest collection of Russian-language books and videos in the city, Wall said, adding that "this is a library for the whole Russian community, not just the elderly." Volunteers can bring books and videos to the homebound, if needed.

The library has English and Yiddish material too, as well as some large-print books.

A new venture is a computer lab, which is expected to open in a few months. "We want to provide a new avenue to communicate with the world, with people's families and the Internet," Wall said. The lab will be geared to seniors, with larger than usual screens and keyboards, and a high ratio of instructors.

The Betel Centre offers programs six days a week and services on Shabbat, primarily to people from 65 to 85, although "we have lots in their late 90s," Wall said. Funding comes from the Ministry of Health, United Way of Greater Toronto, the City of Toronto and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, as well as from membership fees, payment for services and donations.

The building, which was erected in 1982, is undergoing renovation.

Circle of Care, the latest incarnation of Co-Ordinated Services to the Jewish Elderly and Senior Care, also aims to help seniors maintain themselves in the community. Social workers, personal care and housekeeping services are some of the services offered by its highly trained staff.

Circle of Care also offers programs and support groups for the bereaved and the abused.

Nearly 500 well-trained volunteers take an active role in Circle of Care activities, including visitation, van transportation for such needs as shopping and attending social events, and meals on wheels.

"We are recognized for our expertise with certain groups," said president and CEO Michael Scheinert. Staff and volunteers can speak to people in English, Russian, Hebrew, Yiddish and other European languages, and are sensitive to cultural diversity, dietary needs and habits, and the special understanding and sensitivity required by Holocaust survivors.

The services possible with a strong, efficient home-care program are being increasingly recognized, Scheinert said, noting that Roy Romanow's recent report on the future of health care in Canada called for a strong home-care structure as an integral part of the national health-care system, particularly in the areas of acute care needs, palliative care and mental health.

The goal is to better integrate home-care services with the whole continuum of health care, Scheinert said.

Chronic care needs have often been pushed aside, with the focus of many agencies on progress and outcome, Scheinert said. "We lose sight of meeting the needs of the chronically ill for stability and dignity."

There is room for experimentation and development in home-care services, he said. For instance, new technology like phone systems and computer technology can monitor such things as safety, blood sugar and blood pressure.

"There is great potential, provided we still are conscious of the human component of care," Scheinert said. "People who are alone and more frail don't derive their highs and lows from technology."

Circle of Care provides services to five of the six local community care access centres – North York, Scarborough, Toronto, Etobicoke and the city of York – and may extend its reach to York Region.

There is an increased recognition that the needs of provider organizations must be addressed, not just financially but in such matters as training, Scheinert said.

Home care is a volatile sector of the health-care system, he said. "We aren't as visible as hospitals or long-term care facilities. We serve a different population, an invisible population in some respects."

As well, he said, the labour force doesn't have the same level of sophistication as other sectors. "It is 90 per cent women, ethnically and racially diverse, often transient or working for multiple organizations at the same time."

Home care is in the throes of significant change, working out exactly what it is supposed to do and how it is supposed to do it, Scheinert said. The appearance of commercial providers of home care, as opposed to the not-for-profit organizations such as Circle of Care, changes the relationship between care and the community.

"It would be a travesty if not-for-profit organizations can't continue," Scheinert said, noting that one company in Hamilton has recently gone out of business.

Also, there are more demands to meet standards. Circle of Care, for instance, was recently accredited by the Canadian Council on Health Services Accreditation, one of only a handful of home-care organizations to be so recognized.

For more information on these organizations, call the Bernard Betel Centre, 416-225-2112; or Circle of Care, 416-635-2860.

Alluring title, but disappointing book

Taylor said Marie carries a "Catholic guilt" about the Holocaust, and experiences the collective memory of the atrocity that was "handed to a generation who had nothing to do with it."

Taylor herself clearly grappled with this issue. "I belong to [the same] liberal generation that holds this ineffectual guilt about all kinds of things, not just the Holocaust," she said. "We don't find the moral energy to act, so what's the point of memory?"

Nevertheless, Marie spends years "imagining what it would be like for someone else." And in writing this book, Taylor has imagined, too. She has done meticulous research. Sarah and Marie's struggles are realistically and sympathetically portrayed. But it's not enough. In the end, both women remain flat and unengaging.

Meanwhile, Max, who is unfortunately relegated to the book's sidelines, struggles with his own issues. In a discussion with Marie, who is curious about his heritage and relationship with his mother, he says he's "coming to terms with his Judaism." But Taylor never describes that struggle. Perhaps it's because, as a non-Jew, she can't. Instead, she uses his phrase to switch to a struggle of a different sort. Not only is that a copout, it also makes his character hard to understand.

It also makes it hard to understand Marie's love for Max, and what ultimately drives her to go to Paris to read Jeanne Proust's diaries. In fact, the connection between Marie's love of Proust and the rest of the novel is tenuous. Taylor, who is in many ways writing about herself in Marie, forces plot twists in a contrived manner.

In the interview, she said that when writing a book, "you need to have a general notion of where you're going." That may be so, but when you work backward from an alluring title, you run the risk of writing self-consciously. That is this book's greatest disappointment.

Ultimately, Madame Proust and the Kosher Kitchen attempts to be about so much but ends up being about very little. Taylor has tried to encompass so many themes and details that her novel is cluttered with partially explored ideas and characters.

Nevertheless, parts of the book are intriguing, such as Jeanne Proust's account of the Dreyfus Affair, and even moving, such as Sarah's attempts to lead a normal life. Taylor is a talented writer who should be commended for her courage to face her own critics.

Social Credit, anti-Semitism

Stingel resurrects much shocking history, but she notes that Social Credit's anti-Semitism was strictly rhetorical and ideological.

"At no time was the movement anti-Semitic in the Third Reichian sense of officially adopting and transforming that ideology into a policy of discrimination, then executing the policy by a system of aggression," she writes.

Further, she observes that neither premiers Aberhart nor Manning were overt anti-Semites and that most Albertans did not vote for the party, at either the provincial or federal levels, because of its anti-Semitism.

If anti-Semitism in mainstream Canadian politics is the dark cloud, Social Discredit must count as a silver lining. Admirably well-written and concise, it won a Canadian Jewish Book Award last year and a prize from the Montreal Jewish Library in November. It exposes much discreditable conduct within the Social Credit movement and adds significantly to the field of Canadian Jewish studies.

Social Discredit is published by McGill-Queens University Press and sells for $44.95.

Israeli bobsled team hoping for Olympic berth

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

David Greaves has heard all the jokes about the Jamaican bobsled team. He's also quite familiar, thank you very much, with references to Eddie "the Eagle" Edwards, the shaky British ski jumper who gained fame at the 1988 Winter Olympics with his dangerous jumps that bordered on recklessness.

Greaves, for his part, wants people to take his venture seriously. A native of Winnipeg, Greaves has joined forces with two American Jews to create what they hope will be Israel's first-ever Olympic bobsled team.

For a country with barely any winter sports tradition – Israel does ice junior and adult hockey teams – comparisons with the warm-weather Jamaicans are inevitable.

But Greaves, along with his partners Aaron Zeff and John Frank, believes the team can elbow its way into the top echelon of bobsled competitors.

"We're not like the Jamaican bobsled team," he says over the phone with a hint of exasperation. "We've been compared to them non-stop. Our coach has looked at us and he said we have the ability to make serious headway in this sport."

Greaves believes he and his partners could be ranked somewhere between 20th and 30th in the world, "if we work at it."

For the past few months, the trio have been working at it, both on the ice and in backrooms with various sports governing bodies.

On the track, the guys are making progress, Greaves said. In fact, after their first experience, things couldn't get much worse.

On their first run in December, the team crashed at around 100 kilometres per hour while attempting to negotiate turn number seven of 14 at the track in Calgary. They rode the rest of the way upside down. Thankfully, the sled was only a rental.

Since then, Greaves has accepted the wisdom of one of the sport's verities: "There are those who have crashed, there are those about to crash."

"The first crash was horrifying," he said. "But it's cathartic to get back in and go down the course."

Since that early near-disaster, the team has managed to avoid crashing and it's improved its time and technique. Now they can manoeuvre the sled down the 1.4 kilometre track in less than 60 seconds. In a one-week span recently, they recorded 12 clean runs.

"It's important for us," Greaves says. "We want to get down the track on our runners, not on our heads."

Hurtling down the icy track, through narrow chutes at 120 km per hour while threatening to tip over at any time, bobsledding is not a sport for the faint-hearted or those without skill.

Luckily, the pilot of their sled is actually… a pilot.

In his younger days, Zeff flew F-4 Phantom jets for the U.S. Air Force. Once he got the hang of controlling the sled, using two cables to steer the runners, the team made quick progress, Greaves said.

Greaves serves as the team's brakeman, as does Frank. Both bring plenty of muscle to the job. Greaves, 35, is 5-10, 215 lbs. Frank is six feet tall and weighs 205 lbs. Zeff, at five foot 10, 215 lbs. is no slouch either.

Back in high school, Greaves excelled at track and field, specializing in the sprint. It's a skill that stands him in good stead in bobsledding, given that the two team members who participate in a run must generate plenty of momentum in the first few seconds.

Football fans might remember Frank as the tight end on the San Francisco 49ers teams quarterbacked by Joe Montana. Frank won two Super Bowls with that team. When he retired, he enrolled in medical school and is now a plastic surgeon.

Zeff is self-employed and Greaves is an IT professional, working with a small technology firm. Part of his job is to cover Western Canada, which makes it possible for him to work in three- or four-day stopovers in Calgary.

The idea for an Israeli bobsled team originated with Zeff and Frank, who enjoyed ski trips together and thought it would be fun to try their luck in a bobsled. When Zeff suffered an injury, he called on Rich Nairn, the vice-president of media relations for the Phoenix Coyotes, and asked if he knew someone in Calgary who could join them. Nairn, another Winnipegger, immediately thought of his old friend Greaves, who was living there at the time, and the match was made.

The group started working together last fall. With continued improvement on the track, and with the approval of the Israeli Olympic Committee (IOC), the trio are hoping they might qualify for the Turin (Italy) Olympics in 2006.

Off the track, the team pushed for the creation of the Israel Bobsled Federation (IBF) and eventually obtained the support of the Israel Olympic Committee.

With the acceptance of the IBF by the International Federation of Bobsleigh and Tobogganing, the way was open for Israel I to compete in the America's Cup circuit, the entry level of international bobsled events.

The opportunity to advance to the higher tiered European and World Cup circuits will come with more experience and more races, Greaves said.

One final, and crucial, job still needs to be done – becoming citizens of Israel. A few weeks ago, the team went through the final portion of the legal process and Greaves is hopeful they can obtain their citizenship sometime this spring.

"Two things are going on here," Greaves explained. "We love the sport and we love Israel."

Earlier this winter, Greaves experienced something that he said made the whole venture worthwhile.

He and Frank were getting ready for their run at the top of a course when the track official "called Israel I to the bobsled position. 'The track is clear for Israel I,'" he said, "and I still get chills when I hear those words because it's the first time those words have been said for Israel in this sport, ever."

Maccabi seeking soccer players

Maccabi Canada is assembling national soccer teams for boys and girls to compete at the upcoming Pan Am Maccabi Games to be held in Santiago, Chile in December 2003. A public meeting will be held at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Sunday, March 2 at 6:30 p.m. in room 190 of the main building. Soccer players and their families are invited to attend. Further information is available at www.maccabicanada.com.

Israel third at flag football World Cup

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel's national team last week took a surprise bronze medal at the 2003 World Cup of Flag Football in Freeport, Bahamas.

With victories over the French and Uruguayan national teams and a close loss to Team Canada, the Israelis showed they have become a force to be reckoned with in the sport.

The medal round for Israel was decided in a tough semi-final game against the United States, which won 20-7.

Israel had gone into the match on the heels of a 26-0 victory over France, the highest one-game point total of any team in the tournament. That victory propelled the Israelis into one of the semi-final games of the nine-team event. A day earlier, Israel lost a close game to the number two team from Canada 14-6 and defeated Uruguay 12-6 in overtime.

Team Israel finished the tournament tied for third place with two victories and two defeats. The United States defeated Mexico to win the gold medal.

For Israel, it was the best showing so far in international flag football competition.

After the opening day of the tournament, Israel's record stood at 1-1. On day two, Israel was matched up against France in one of the quarter-finals. It took less than five minutes for Israel to show that this was a completely different squad than the one that finished sixth out of seven at the 2002 World Cup.

Quarterback Ron Dermer was on target all day, hitting Josh Kleiner with two touchdown passes. Dermer had plenty of help from team Israel's tough defence, led by Stu Berger and Yona Mishan.

Berger was a defensive force all tournament long, nabbing three interceptions and recording numerous knockdowns and diving stops.

In the semi-final game against the Americans, Israel gave up an early score, but shortly afterward regained the initiative with a touchdown that gave it the lead at 7-6.

It was the first time in two years the Americans had given up a touchdown.

The United States scored once more before the half to take a 12-7 lead. Israel had an opportunity to go ahead early in the second half but could not score after driving deep into U.S. territory.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

My best friend and I been inseparable for as long as I can remember. At the beginning of this year, however, she became friends with a new girl at our school and is starting to spend a lot of time with her. She has persuaded my friend to experiment with drugs and stay out late at parties. I miss my friend, and I am worried about what her new friend will influence her to do next. How can I help her?

Worried Friend

Dear Worried Friend,

You are in a difficult situation that has no easy solution. The first thing you need to do is talk to your friend. Pick a time when you know you will not be interrupted and explain to her that you are worried about her behaviour. You need to be aware that it is possible she will shut you out. Often, when people are in trouble, they do not realize it until much later. It is important that you do not get upset with her, because even though she may not think she needs your help, she does.

If talking to her one-on-one is not effective, it may help to gather a large group of her friends and form an intervention. Let each person have a chance to tell your friend how they feel about her and that they are worried about her. Hopefully, this will help her realize how many people care about her, and who want to help her change her ways.

If the above suggestions do not work, it may be time to get the help of an adult. Talk to a trusted teacher or guidance counsellor or your friend's parents. They will be able to provide you with information about drug abuse clinics and may be able to convince her to agree to help. Talking to her parents may seem like a betrayal now, but your friend will thank you for it in the end. She needs all the help and support she can get.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN

Getting ready

In his book Six Days of War, Israeli historian Michael Oren points out that former U.S. president Lyndon Johnson wondered why the Jews of America supported the 1967 war in Israel, and at the same time, dominated the anti-Vietnam war movement. To Johnson, it seemed like a paradox.

Many Canadian activists today don't understand this supposed contradiction, either. For them, a stand against war goes hand in hand with demonstrations against Israel. On many Canadian campuses, Americans and Israelis have come to symbolize capitalist oppression of beleaguered Iraqis and Palestinians. In a world filled with complexities, many in our institutions of higher learning have simplified the battle, limiting it to leftist clichés and high school discourse.

This year, the CJN education supplement has included articles on a variety of issues, including bullying, Holocaust education and a look at the four double-cohort students we have been following for the past two years.

However, it has especially focused on campus life and some of the issues that have surfaced in the past few months, with a report on student experiences across Canada, a discussion on academic anti-Jewish theories that masquerade as objective analysis and an article on the availability of Jewish campus services.

Of course, each school, department and faculty member is unique, which means that every student's experience will be different. But with the backdrop of a possible war with Iraq and the ongoing battle with terrorism, certain patterns have emerged on many university campuses. Jewish students who choose to get involved are being challenged to defend their political commitments in real and complex terms. They are being drawn into discussions about Israel and the Palestinians that touch them on very personal levels. For Canadians who argue against Israel, it's a matter of presenting facts, right or wrong. For many Jewish kids, this is not just a free speech issue, it is an existential debate on personal identity. It comes down to a basic belief that Israel is fighting for a right to exist in a world that looks for reasons to deny her that right.

And perhaps that's what Johnson didn't understand.

Next year, Ontario universities and colleges will experience their largest enrolment ever as grade 12 and 13 students graduate at the same time. As kids get ready to go to school, they need to prepare themselves to face accusations and debate the issues. They need to learn to distinguish between acceptable criticism of Israel and anti-Semitism, between civil discourse and hateful propaganda.

As parents prepare to let go and watch their kids become adults, they also need to get ready for discussion and debate. It's time for parents to educate themselves so that they're ready when the questions come home.

Schools face new challenges in teaching about Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

No disrespect intended for the study of rabbinics or Tanach, says Carleton University student Noah Zatzman, but they won't help Jewish university students confront anti-Israel sentiment.

A 2002 graduate of the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Zatzman would venture to say that the study of modern Jewish history, particularly the Arab-Israeli conflict, should be mandatory for students at Jewish high schools.

"If you don't know your facts, you can't advocate for Israel," Zatzman said.

At CHAT, students in courses on 20th-century history in Grades 11 and 12 do "major work" on the history of the Zionist movement and Israel's fight for independence, headmaster Paul Shaviv told The CJN. Only the Grade 11 course is compulsory, but a majority of students also take it the next year, he added. This year, the school instituted a unit on contemporary Israel for Grade 9 students.

Because of the ongoing intifadah that began in Sept. 2000, the school has introduced several supplementary programs, bringing in outside speakers, including several political science professors, to address current events and concerns, said Shaviv. Some events have been held in co-operation with Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (now Hillel of Greater Toronto) to prepare students for anti-Israel sentiment they may encounter on campus.

Noah Zatzman

In December, 129 CHAT students took part in a special Birthright trip to Israel. "The school is committed to taking our students to Israel," Shaviv said. In addition, many of the Jewish studies teachers are from Israel, and much of the program is taught in Hebrew.

"We want our students to leave the school with a strong identification with Israel that will translate into support, underpinned by a strong factual knowledge," said Shaviv.

But Shaviv noted the Jewish educational system is "only just beginning to understand and make provision for the very charged atmosphere in which our young people will grow up."

'They could end up with a Palestinian roommate'

It's difficult, he said, to prepare high school students for the situation they will encounter on campus.

"It's very difficult for them to imagine it until they experience it. I think that is also true of our community as a whole. We're facing a struggle taking place in a context of which we have little direct experience."

York University student Aliza Libman, a graduate of the religious Zionist girls' school Ulpanat Orot, said the importance placed on Israel by her high school – as well as the year she spent in Israel at a women's yeshiva, Midreshet Lindenbaum – have helped her deal with anti-Israel sentiment on campus.

At Ulpana, Libman recalls, "they would cancel biology class to have an event about Israel." In her OAC writers' craft class, students wrote letters to newspapers to counter anti-Israel media reports. "They definitely put it as a high priority."

"There is no question the greatest weapon against anti-Israel sentiment is definitely education," said Rabbi Aaron Greenberg, who teaches at both Ulpana and Or Chaim, the affiliated boys' high school. "We hope that our students will be equipped. The question is, until you're in the trenches, you never really know what it will be like."

At Midreshet Lindenbaum, Libman took part in one-on-one debating, with one student taking the Israeli side and another the Palestinian side. The role-playing was designed for American students returning to Ivy League colleges.

"They could end up with a Palestinian roommate," said Libman, who lives at home. "If I don't want to talk to a Palestinian [on campus], I don't have to."

But Libman feels that having lived in Israel gives her the authority to say," 'I know what it's like.' It gives me a holistic perspective. I know it's more than just the headlines."

ISRAEL'S CHILDREN
THE INNOCENT VICTIMS OF WAR

WE MUST BE PREPARED

Na'amat in Israel has been intensively and diligently preparing their Day Care Centres in order to provide maximum security for the children under their care in the event of war. But more must be done.

In the event of an emergency, it would not be possible for the staff to put gas masks on every child in time. Therefore, they must make sure that the shelters are secured, that they have good ventilation and air filter systems, that gaskets around the windows and doors are replaced and that all systems are brought up to optimal levels. Bottled water, food, sanitary needs, such as diapers, battery operated radios, cordless phones, emergency lighting & first aid kits must be purchased. The list goes on.

Na'amat Day Care Centres are regarded as essential operations according to the Home Front Command and must be kept open if war breaks out.

There are 300 Na'amat Early Childhood Educational Day Care Centres that must be made ready for War. The cost to prepare and operate these centres will be a minimum of $290.00 per centre per day. They can't do it alone ! They need our help !

Transmitting Jewish Culture Across Generations

For over thirty years, the Jewish Studies Program at the University of Toronto has been engaged in teaching and scholarship on all aspects of Jewish civilization. This multidisciplinary program, which draws upon faculty from the departments of Religion, Philosophy, History, Near and Middle Eastern Studies, English, German, Sociology, Anthropology, and Political Science, is unique in Canada for the breadth and depth of its curriculum.

Over sixty courses are offered, leading to a minor, major, or specialist degree in Jewish Studies. Students can study languages (biblical and modern Hebrew, Yiddish, Aramaic, Syriac and Greek), Jewish thought and literature, Jewish history from antiquity to the present, modern Jewish society, and Israeli politics. Overseas study is encouraged, and scholarships are available for study at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Anti-Israel environment on campus creating identity crisis for many students

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

For most undergraduates, the first few weeks of school involve arranging dorms, buying books and settling into classes. University information packages don't mention that activism and identity politics have now become a part of the program for many Jewish students.

Anti-Israel posters, swastikas, wall paintings of the Middle East that erase Israel, anti-Israel and anti-Semitic articles in school newspapers written by faculty and students, speakers that present distorted views of the Middle East and information tables with documents challenging Israel's right to exist are forcing students to question their identities and wonder whether they can articulate their views.

In Ottawa, Noah Zatzman is a first-year student in Carleton University's bachelor of public affairs and policy management program. When he first arrived at Carleton, he was unsettled by posters across campus announcing "the demise of Israel." These days, he says, his daily walk through the central tunnels by a painting of Palestine that covers the entire state of Israel with a keffiyah is frightening.

> 'Painting of Palestine that covers the entire state of Israel with a keffiyah is frightening'

"I was in such a state of shock my first few weeks of school that I couldn't sleep at night," he said.

These days, Zatzman said, it seems to be acceptable to say things about Israel that would be considered racist if said about another people or nation.

"I can't help but take these statements as personal attacks," he said.

For Zatzman, being Jewish has a lot to do with his identification with the state of Israel. Challenging Israel's right to exist, he said, is the same as saying he has no right to be Jewish. It's not a position he thought he would have to defend on campus in Canada today.

On the other bank of the Rideau Canal stands the University of Ottawa, which university spokesperson Lyse Huot said has "a diverse student body" that is "strongly committed to different points of view." Recognizing the potential for problems, the university instituted a policy last spring governing the use of the Jock Turcot University Centre to ensure that all students who congregate there feel comfortable. All posters in the centre require the approval of the university's student federation. Activities that "promote hatred, violence, propaganda or are of a political nature designed to disparage a government, state, country or religion" are not allowed. In addition, activities that "harm the university's reputation or place the university in the middle of ethnic or other world conflicts" cannot take place.

This is a far cry from 1983, when JSU/Hillel was banned from the campus by a student council that decided JSU/Hillel's support of Israel made it a racist organization. Soon after, the student council was impeached and the JSU was reinstated.

For Pearl Jacobson, a student at the University of Ottawa's teacher college, the centre's rules mean that the debate about Israel's right to exist is held on other parts of the campus, areas she can avoid. Thanks to those rules, she feels comfortable going to classes and walking through the university's central buildings.

On the other hand, Jacobson has felt overwhelmed and frustrated at talks organized by the Middle East Discussion Group at Carleton University because, she said, she hears only arguments that deligitimize Israeli and Jewish history. She said she decided to attend those meetings after fellow students convinced her they promoted civil debate, but realized after a few meetings that it was not worth going.

Jacobson, who grew up attending public school in Toronto, said she is used to discussions about history and competing land claims in the Middle East, but "these days, there is no discussion. There is only attack, attack, attack."

At McMaster University in Hamilton, Ontario, swastikas and anti-Semitic grafitti have been painted on the Jewish Student Association's door five times in the past two years.

"The administration quickly paints over the door so that Jewish students are not alarmed," said Judy Schwartz, the association's director.

In other incidents Schwartz noted, students threw an egg at a kippah-wearing student off campus and the JSA recently received an anti-Semitic letter.

Other than that, "it's generally very quiet," she said.

Given world events, Schwartz said, "Jewish students have slowly become more aware of their roles and the need to get more educated and active on campus."

Until recently, the JSA didn't want to take a political stand on the Middle East, said president Carly Shiner.

The focus has been on Jewish religious events rather than Israel because "we wanted to represent all Jewish students on campus," she said.

In the fall, the JSA hosted an Israel table in the university's marketplace, a meeting point at the centre of campus.

"We agreed with the Muslim Student Association ahead of time that the content of the material displayed would only be cultural," Shiner said.

Political science student Michael Pukin said that this past year has been very difficult for him "as a Jew who cares about Israel and free speech."

Pukin, the op-ed editor of The Silhouette, McMaster's school newspaper, has found himself under attack every time he writes a pro-Israel article. He says he is one of the few voices defending Israel in the paper.

"It's a grave mistake to not pay attention to what is being said in the campus newspapers," he said.

"The media is presenting Israel as South Africa and America as worse than Iraq," Pukin said, adding that "if you repeat lies long enough, people start to believe them."

Two years ago, Jewish students hoping to celebrate Israel Day at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) in London were challenged by protesters who walked through the university's community centre atrium with signs proclaiming that "Israel equals injustice."

Fighting anti-Israel bias with Jewish pride

At the Conservative movement's congregational high school program, held weekly at Adath Israel Congregation, some students have "bought into" anti-Israel media reports and "have no difficulty seeing Israel as an occupier," said Chaim Klein, who teaches there and at CHAT. The 75 students in the program represent a variety of denominational affiliations and include former day school students.

Last year, Klein said he spent more time than usual in the supplementary program discussing Israel.

"My fear was that the students would be barraged with negative visions of Judaism and Israel. I felt we should spend a fair amount of time critiquing the critics."

When Palestinians accused the Israeli army of massacring civilians last sping in Jenin – allegations that were later disproved – Klein discussed actual casualty figures, how other countries might have behaved in Israel's place and the ethics of the Israeli army. "I try to build a certain amount of Jewish pride."

At the elementary and middle school levels, Israeli-Arab tensions are addressed differently than in high schools.

At Associated Hebrew Schools, for example, the emphasis is on helping Israel rather than on terrorism, said educational director Rabbi Abraham Soffer.

Although the curriculum includes current events, the word "terror" is avoided whenever possible, Rabbi Soffer said. "You never know how kids will react."

Last year Associated students in both elementary and middle school collected almost $100,000 to pay for an ambulance for Israel, he said. "It was a wonderful learning experience," said Rabbi Soffer.

The concept of solidarity with Israel is very important, he added. "We are one people, one nation."

Israel is a major focus at Associated, with arts and crafts projects for Grades 3 to 5, large assemblies for Yom Ha'atzmaut and Yom Yerushalayim, and Zionist history beginning with the study of Theodor Herzl in Grade 6.

> 'The more you experience Israel, the better you become part of it'

Similarly, Bialik Hebrew Day School advocates the love of Israel and the teaching of Israel, said director of education Uri Korin. Most of its teaching resources are either from Israel or Israeli-oriented, he noted.

In fact, he said, Israel is integrated into every subject. Even the school sports day is called Maccabiah. In-school competitions and celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut and other holidays are also supplemented with a letter exchange program in Grade 5.

"The more you experience Israel, the better you become part of it," said Korin.

Amiel Sabari, vice-principal and curriculum developer at United Synagogue Day School, which also offers Israel-oriented competitions, Israeli speakers and fundraising for Israel, said his school "would like to instill the connection to the land, to the people and to the State of Israel – a commitment they will have to demonstrate throughout their life."

He also wants students to understand the necessity of a strong Israel in order that there be "a good life" for Jews outside of Israel.

There are many issues around the teaching of Israel, said Chana Pinchasi, a shlichah from the Jewish Agency to Toronto's UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education. A professional development day for 1,300 teachers in the day school and supplementary school system in November was devoted to that subject.

"I think the schools are doing great work," she said. But there is always a question of balance between teaching what she terms the "mythical Israel" and the Israel of today.

A more challenging question, she noted, is how to send the message that Israelis continue to live their lives, and on the other hand ask students to help victims of terror. "It's very complex."

'Guinea pig' students sweat the 'double cohort'

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Welcome to the class of uncertainty.

As this year's high school students get ready to graduate, it is still unclear what grades they'll need to get into their post-secondary school of choice. Registrars are expecting threshold grade cutoffs to go up from last year, they just don't know by how much.

Ontario Grade 12 students will be arriving at post-secondary schools at the same time as their Grade 13 counterparts, which means many Canadian institutes of higher learning have received double the number of Ontario applicants. However, only Ontario schools will get funding for the increased enrolment from this so-called double cohort.

Other schools, such as McGill University in Montreal, may not be able to accomodate more students from out of province in all their faculties, but McGill is hoping to increase the total number of Ontario students accepted next year, a spokesperson said.

Dana Doidge

The University of Toronto is planning to accept 9,311 high school students for next year, a 50 per cent increase over September 2000, when it accepted 6,205.

Last year, it accepted 7,623 high school students.

U of T spokesperson Sheldon Levy said that doubling the number of spots for the extra high school graduates would have compromised the quality of education provided.

Some faculties at U of T, like engineering science, are estimating entry averages will be 90 per cent. Others departments, such as life sciences and commerce, will require mid-80 averages. The cutoff for arts and sciences will be somewhere around 83 per cent, Levy predicted.

Chana Libman

McGill is expecting entry requirements to go up by 1 per cent from last year, a spokesperson said. Last year, the faculty of arts entrance average was 84 and sciences was 82 per cent.

In addition to higher demand due to the double cohort, many high school guidance departments are reporting an increase in the number of applications being sent out by each student – with some applying to as many as 10 spots. That means many universities will be sending out acceptance letters at the last minute, as students turn down their second and third choices.

With only four months until graduation, The CJN interviewed four students we've been following for the past two years.

Noah Buchman, Dana Doidge, Yonah Krakowsky and Chana Libman, all top students who are now in Grade 12, are used to dealing with uncertainty. They were in Grade 9 when Ontario schools began implementing the new provincial curriculum and in June they will be part of the first Grade 12 Ontario graduating class.

This is the class that took Grade 10 provincial literacy tests that didn't wind up counting, used textbooks that were still in the developmental stages and adjusted to a new high school math program that their elementary school curriculum didn't prepare them for.

"The word 'guinea pig' has been used to describe our class fairly often over the past four years," said Dana, a Grade 12 student at the Claude Watson School for the Arts at Earl Haig Secondary School.

Stressed students sweat the double cohort

Dana also noted that her year will never be in the position to "rule the school," because the Grade 13s have had the advantage of being the senior students this year.

'You see kids crying after tests'

But the 18-year-old is still optimistic that her high school years have been positive, because "the experience has prepared me for the future," she said.

Noah said the uncertainty over grades and university admissions has made this past year very stressful. There is an awareness that every mark will count, he said, and "you see kids crying after tests because they've missed one or two questions."

The Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto student said he studies most nights until midnight because he's determined to get into McGill or the University of Western Ontario.

Yonah Krakowsky

Noah said his choices were partially determined by the current anti-Israel atmosphere on some campuses.

"I want to study at a university with a large Jewish population," he said.

Yonah is a student at Yeshivat Or Chaim and is hoping to go to a yeshiva on the West Bank next year – if he can get in. "The yeshiva program is only one year, but I can see myself staying in Israel for longer," Yonah said.

Noah Buchman

Chana, an Ulpanat Orot Girls School student, said that being in the double cohort made this last year very stressful.

"Going to university is already an uncertain time for high school students. The ambiguity surrounding next year's admissions has meant that students press for extra marks after each test.

Uncertain time for high school students

"Many teachers get pressured to push up everyone's marks because it's the double cohort year," she said.

Next year, Chana plans to go to Michlala, a college for women in Jerusalem. After that, she's not sure. "I would like to settle in Israel. My parents would be nervous, but they would support me," she said.

In the meantime, Chana is applying to York University, the University of Toronto and Stern College for Women in New York for the year after next, just in case.

Schools becoming more active in preventing bullying

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

No child wants to be bullied, but for too many, it's an unavoidable fact of life.

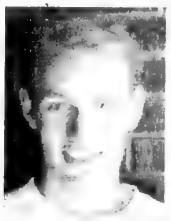
Daniel (not his real name) knows first hand how difficult bullying is to avoid and to endure.

"Every day I'd go to school and this group of guys, who used to be my friends, would find me and start pushing me around for no reason," says Daniel, now 15.

"I didn't do anything to them and there was nothing I could do to stop it."

The abuse went on for two years, from age 12 to 14, until Daniel was able to meet new friends in high school.

According to statistics on bullying, Daniel isn't the only child to suffer from this mentally, emotionally and sometimes physically devastating occurrence in his school-age years.



Jay Solomon

Jay Solomon, an anti-bullying advocate, a former victim and author of Being Bullied? You're Not Alone!, estimates 20 per cent of school-aged kids are bullies or victims, but says even that number is probably low.

Solomon, who defines bullying as "an attack, physical or emotional, on another person by way of any communication or intimidation, alienation and physical aggression," says it is not always reported by people who know it's taking place.

He says acts of bullying can range from spreading rumours to intentional exclusion to physical violence.

"Here's the most staggering statistic," says Solomon. "Peers are present 88 per cent of the time and teachers are present 14 per cent of the time in classrooms and four per cent of the time in the playground. If you want to reduce bullying, it has to be reported by spectators."

Bullying goes unreported for a number of reasons, Solomon says.

"Sometimes it's not reported out of fear," he says. "Fear of retaliation, fear they'll be next."

Other times, children feel alone and aren't comfortable talking about it. Compounding the problem, Solomon says, is that many "schools don't have policies that allow for anonymous reporting. Anonymous reporting is what has enabled Crime Stoppers to be so effective."

There's also a less obvious reason bullying goes unreported, says longtime elementary school teacher Sarah Burakowski. "The techniques children use are often difficult to detect," she says, especially among girls.

"I find that dealing with girls is a lot harder. [Their bullying is] much more subtle. It takes the form of taunting, teasing, making nasty phone calls, writing notes, gossiping, intimidating and alienating."

Boys, by contrast, are much more physical in their behaviour towards each other, making bullying easier to see, she says.

Though bullying often assumes different forms for boys and girls, Burakowski says it affects all age groups, from elementary school-age children to those in high school, and what's worse, she says, is that the rates of bullying may be increasing.

"It appears to be worse now," she says. "Maybe we're more aware of it now than we were 10 to 15 years ago. Our [school] office deals with two to three cases a week, if not more, but I'm sure it goes on more. Not everything gets reported."

When it is reported, consequences can be severe. "When it's reported, we investigate and talk to the bully, the victim and witnesses," says Burakowski. "Depending on the severity, students can be punished with a detention or even be suspended. We suspended a student for seven days for issuing a threat," she continues. "Some school boards have a 'zero tolerance' policy, which means it won't be tolerated in any form, but it will be dealt with."

Burakowski thinks bullying will always be a problem, despite the fact "schools are doing the best they can. I don't think it's ever going to end because it's part of human nature."

Some schools, however, have been developing creative and aggressive programs to try to prevent bullying before it occurs.

"We learned a long time ago that bullying is the result of issues that pertain to family, emotional issues or psychological issues," says Uri Korin, director of education at Bialik Hebrew Day School in Toronto, which runs from junior kindergarten to Grade 8.

"It's not just a phenomenon that pertains to a child's behaviour in school," he says.

"The best way to deal with it is to be preventative and proactive. We spend time with teachers on professional development more than once a year. We also work on positive discipline. When a teacher suspects any negative behaviour, there is intervention, and that prevents further development."

The school is also in the seventh year of a Peace Makers program, which trains children to solve problems before they become a major issue.

Bialik is also in the third year of a parent-assisted program that provides organized games during recess, which ensures students play together under supervision and observation.

In addition to having a full-time social worker at school, Korin believes these methods are successful.

"I think we see less and less aggressive behaviour," says Korin. "It's a combination of awareness of the issue and our programs. It really helps."

The Associated Hebrew Schools has also developed ongoing programs that watch for and deal with bullying.

Live & Learn

Teachers, students trained to spot bullying

"Bullying can happen anywhere at any time," says Sandy Rabinowitz, general studies principal at the school's Kamin elementary campus.

"We're trying to be proactive, so we talk to kids before it happens in the hopes they'll be taught how to cope," he says.

"From Grade 1, we teach 'I care language,' intended to help children deal with conflict," Rabinowitz says.

"We follow that up in the middle school with conflict resolution language," adds Gail Freeman, head of guidance at Associated's middle school.

"We teach students to use words and phrases like, 'I feel,' 'when you,' 'because.' Then we teach them the language needed to work towards a resolution to their problems," she says. "We're trying to create a caring environment in the classroom."

Sarah Burakowski

In addition, training teachers to encourage students to come forward when they witness bullying or are a victim of it, for the first time, the middle school is holding an intensive anti-bullying conference aimed at students in grades 6, 7 and 8.

"What we've decided to do to get the message across even stronger is to have a one-day conference [this month] on how to establish positive relationships," says Freeman. "We're giving them a chance to listen to other kids and guest speakers about awkward social situations, see videos and work through different activities."

"It's an intensive day that emphasizes that social relationships are important," adds Rabinowitz. "It's not just the bully and the victim that have a problem. We're trying to encourage students to stand up against social interactions that can become bullying."

"We need to be up front and in the forefront of developing a child's emotional intelligence," says Freeman.

With all these attempts at increased public awareness, Solomon and Weisz are hopeful that future generations of boys and girls will be spared the scars of bullying.

Bullying Behaviours

Are you not sure whether you or your child are being bullied and are afraid to report it out of fear you're being too presumptuous? Here's a guide to degrees of bullying that can help you decide. (Each includes actions typical of physical aggression, social alienation, verbal aggression and intimidation.)

Mild Bullying: pushing, shoving, spitting, kicking, hitting, gossiping, embarrassing, setting someone up to look foolish, spreading rumours, mocking, name calling, dirty looks, taunting, teasing about clothing or possessions, threatening to reveal personal information, graffiti, playing a dirty trick, defacing property or clothing.

Moderate Bullying: Defacing property, stealing, physical acts that are demeaning and humiliating but not bodily harmful, locking someone in a closed or confined space, public humiliation, excluding from a group, social rejection, ethnic slurs, setting someone up to take blame, teasing about appearance, intimidating phone calls, taking possessions, extortion.

Severe Bullying: physical violence against family or friends, threatening with a weapon, inflicting bodily harm, maliciously excluding, manipulating social order to achieve rejection, malicious rumour mongering, threatening with total isolation by peer group, verbal threats of aggression against property or possessions, verbal threats of violence or of inflicting bodily harm, threats of using coercion against family or friends, coercion, threatening with a weapon.

Advocacy can overwhelm students

At that time, the UWO student newspaper, The Gazette, reported that "Israel Day had drawn protests for the past four years" and that "the protesters had consulted with the University Students' Council before staging their protest."

But "this year, Israel Day was relatively calm," UWO student Josh Shuval said.

Generally, "anti-Israel and anti-globalization activists don't seem to attract a lot of attention at this campus," Shuval said.

However, Paul Rakowski, president of the Jewish Student Union, said that for every "one pro-Israel article [The Gazette publishes], the paper publishes four pro-Palestinian responses."

Referring to articles and letters on the Middle East published in the student paper in the past two years that have been written by faculty, Rakowski said, "The student newspaper has been hijacked by faculty members."

In a letter to the editor written March 22, 2002 by a UWO professor, Israel was called a "terrorist organization" and was accused of "dropping napalm indiscriminately on Palestinian settlements in a fairly blatant attempt at ethnic cleansing."

Rebecca Colman, a UWO student, wrote a letter refuting The Gazette's articles but the paper refused to publish it.

In the Jan. 9 edition of the paper, Rakowski published an article about anti-Semitism in response to an earlier Dec. 4 editorial challenging him to define the term.

"Supporting Israel can take over your entire agenda," Rakowski said, adding that students can find it difficult to study, socialize and lead normal campus lives if they take up the challenge of defending Israel.

Membership of the JSU has almost doubled over the past few years, Shuval said. "Students are now more concerned about putting on a Shabbat dinner for themselves than about fighting for the greater cause."

More religious and social events are being planned so that students don't feel overwhelmed by Israel advocacy, program director of London Campus Services/JSU Jordan Cares said.

"We have to be careful not to forfeit our Judaism for the sake of Israel," Cares said.

At King's College at Dalhousie University in Halifax this past fall, Norman Finklestein, an academic known for controversial opinions about the Holocaust, gave a talk about the Middle East conflict.

First-year student Jacob Binder decided to attend, even though the Jewish Student's Association warned members to stay away because the lecture might be offensive.

"The talk was full of misrepresentations," Binder said. "Finklestein talked about the so-called massacre in Jenin and repeatedly referred to Israel as an apartheid state. He told the students that Israeli settlements were established for the sole purpose of perpetuating Palestinian poverty."

According to Binder, the talk had an awful effect on the students on campus. "For the next week, conversations in the dining hall centred around Israel and the atrocities Finklestein accused Israel of committing.

"Any effort to defend Israel was met with hostility," he said. "I've gotten used to not discussing the situation with people on campus who are clearly too angry to have balanced conversations."

Dealing with intimidation

At Simon Fraser University in Vancouver, British Columbia, stories about the Mideast conflict regularly appear in the pages of The Peak, the school newspaper.

Over the past few years, Elliott Campbell, a communications student at SFU, has regularly submitted pro-Israel articles and letters to The Peak.

In the past, Campbell said, his "works were edited and some of my letters didn't get published. This year, the paper has been a little better, but it's still biased."

According to Eyal Lichtmann, executive director of the Vancouver Hillel, the publication of a double page centre spread about pro-Palestinian journalist Na'eem Jeenah in The Peak was just one of the many incidents that have created an intimidating atmosphere for Jewish students at SFU.

Since the beginning of the year, the Palestinian Solidarity Group (PSG) has brought in speakers, shown movies and videos and arranged protests, Lichtmann said.

Students debate the issues at Carleton University.

He said the PSG has also recently conscripted the political science, communication and history student unions to their cause and organized anti-war protests which always turn into anti-Israel demonstrations.

By involving Jewish groups that are against the occupation, the PSG present themselves as the balanced campus voice, Lichtmann said, adding that as a result, Jewish students at SFU are afraid to express pro-Israel points of view openly on campus. They are joining Jewish student associations such as Hillel so they can comfortably express their opinions, Lichtman said.

Since last year, the number of students in British Columbia's Hillel has almost tripled. Two months ago, students and faculty, both Jewish and non-Jewish, formed an Israel advocacy group.

Lichtmann's biggest challenge now is assuring students that it's all right to express their views on campus.

"We have to build up their confidence and fight the intimidation," he said. "It's a matter of convincing them that most people are unaligned and interested in all points of view."

The only leading American university with a Jewish heart.

At the heart of Yeshiva University are its undergraduate colleges — Yeshiva College, Stern College for Women, and Sy Syms School of Business. Here students pursue a dual curriculum that combines rigorous requirements in the liberal arts and sciences with a parallel program of Jewish studies. The workload is substantial, but so are the rewards. Graduates are prominent in many fields and communal organizations

Yeshiva is one of the leading academic centers in the U.S., rated 40th among the nations top 50 research universities according to U.S. News & World Report. It is home to the Albert Einstein College of Medicine, the Benjamin N. Cardozo School of Law, the Ferkauf Graduate School of Psychology, and the Wurzweiler School of Social Work. Outstanding graduate and professional programs are offered at the Bernard Revel Graduate School and the Azrieli Graduate School of Jewish Education and Administration.

Rabbinic training and instruction are provided by the affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary, along with professional training of cantors and courses in Jewish liturgical music at the Philip and Sarah Belz School of Jewish Music. There are also two affiliated high schools.

How can one institution excel across such a broad range? By embodying the centuries-old commitment of the Jewish People to learning, continuity, and the advancement of human knowledge. Yeshiva University is today a unique and vital resource for the Jewish community and for the wider world.

Currently, more than 100 Canadian students are enrolled in our schools and affiliates. If you'd like to know more, we'd welcome your call.

Will Holocaust education survive?

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Over the summer, Trudi Birger put the finishing touches on The Vow, a manuscript based on her life as a Holocaust survivor and immigrant to Israel, and sent it to her publisher in Toronto.

Birger's first book, A Daughter's Gift of Love, which has been used as an educational resource because it's easy to read, describes her years in the Lithuanian ghetto of Kovno and the Stutthof concentration camp in Poland. The book has been translated into 13 languages and is available in 15 countries.

Trudi Birger

The Vow continues Birger's story and discusses how the Holocaust guided her toward a life of volunteerism. After the war, the newly arrived immigrant to Israel volunteered as a social worker, adopting 50 families from the poorest neighbourhoods of Jerusalem, assisting mothers in need, helping hundreds of children meet higher educational and career goals and founding the Dental Volunteers for Israel, an internationally supported clinic that provides free dental care for Jewish and Arab children.

Before her sudden death on July 18, it was clear that Birger had found a new life after the Holocaust, which included writing two books about her wartime experiences. Like many other survivors, Birger felt compelled to record her biography so the enormity of the Holocaust would never be forgotten.

But as this generation of eyewitnesses comes closer to the ends of their lives, some are wondering how the story of the Holocaust will find life after their deaths and whether education can play a role in enabling those who didn't live through the experience to effectively describe it.

About 15 years ago, just as Holocaust survivors broke their long period of silence, the benefits of teaching through the arts – poetry, prose, film and music – also became apparent, says York University professor Myra Novogrodsky.

While bringing live witnesses into schools can sometimes be the most effective way to teach about the Holocaust, it was difficult on survivors, and "many only wanted to go once a month," Novogrodsky said.

Novels and films became another resource used by educators to fulfil provincial curriculum requirements on Holocaust education.

Professor Lesley Shore at the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education (OISE) of the University of Toronto said that teaching through the arts is one of the most effective ways to educate because experiences processed through emotions and the body become real "in ways that simple memorization of dates and facts … do not.

"Because teaching about the Holocaust is so difficult, because of its incommensurability – the enormity of its obscenity, the impossibility of understanding – approaching it through the arts opens up meaningful entry points.

Cast from I am First A Human Being Dave Lapommeray, playwright Irene Tomaszewski and Yaelle Wittes.

"An imaginative entry point – through art or poetry or, in some cases, through drama – opens a wider horizon on what is ultimately impossible to imagine and learn," Shore said.

Some schools have staged plays that explore the subject. In the fall, I Am First A Human Being was performed at the Archbishop Romero High School and the Nelson Mandela Park Public School in Toronto. Written by Irene Tomaszewski, the play is based on the prison letters of Krystyna Wituska, a Catholic Polish Resistance fighter in World War II and Nelson Mandela, the former president of South Africa.

Students relate to the experiences of these historical figures because they have studied or read about them in newspapers, Tomaszewski said. When they see characters from their own backgrounds presented on a stage by actors their own age, they are given an opportunity to respond on an emotional level to something they understand cognitively, she explained.

However, many educators feel that teaching through the arts can only be effective when knowledge of the history is a prerequisite. Others find that teaching beyond the facts is simply impossible.

As someone who has gone into classes to describe her experiences as a survivor, York University professor Judy Cohen said she "often feels that the events, in their horrid details, once spoken, somehow become trivial. For there are no expressions that would or could convey the real essence of a Birkenau experience and make sense of it to the uninitiated."

Holocaust education is important if "there is a lesson to be learned by today's generation about the consequences of blind conformity and obedience to authority, about unexamined, excessive nationalism… the abdication of individual responsibility and… the practical implementation of extreme hatred," Cohen said.

And clearly, she said, there is value in documenting "a history that is in danger of being obliterated by revisionists and deniers."

But if Holocaust education is to convey more than historical dates in order to engage students on an emotional level, "the greatest challenge will be finding the most effective way to teach about the events without trivializing the experience," Cohen said.

Holocaust teacher training in small communities

In response to an increasing number of requests from educators for Holocaust education information and methodology, the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario has implemented a teacher training program at universities across the province.

Esther Poznansky

"The program is offered to experienced educators and teachers, as well as teacher candidates enrolled in faculties of education," said Michael Soberman, the program's lead facilitator.

"The workshops are a powerful experience for teachers and teacher candidates who are instructed on how to teach about the Holocaust in a meaningful and age-appropriate manner. The workshops include personal testimony from Holocaust survivors, who add a personal and intimate element to the sensitive subject matter," he said.

In January, the program was initiated for teacher candidates enrolled at Brock University's faculty of education. Sessions followed this season at Queen's Lakehead, Trent and Nipissing universities.

In addition, the workshops are offered as part of teacher training. Over 30 teachers have enrolled from the Limestone County public school board in Kingston in an upcoming professional development day.

Holocaust memoir digest

"It's part of our tradition to write and record," says Esther Poznansky, project director of the Holocaust Memoir Digest.

Poznansky has compiled the writings and recordings of survivors' memoirs into a digest to help teachers, students and researchers investigate the Holocaust from various perspectives.

The digest, which operates under the auspices of the Holocaust Resource Centre of London Jewish Federation, is divided into subjects that allow students and teachers to investigate a topic without having to read all the material available on the subject.

Terminology relating to the Holocaust is also explained so that users will understand the differences between such terms as concentration camps, death camps and transit camps, Poznansky said. Maps and study guides are also included.

For more information, see www.holocaustmemoirdigest.org.

Poetry after Auschwitz

Susan Gubar's Poetry After Auschwitz (Indiana University Press) explores the role that artistic expression can play in preserving the memory of the Holocaust.

Survivors Max Eisen and Judy Cohen standing with the director of Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario.

The book looks at poetry written in the United States and Europe since 1960 and its attempts to grapple with the personal and political, ethical and aesthetic consequences of the Shoah.

Gubar questions the notion that the only meaningful reports are from those who witnessed firsthand the attempted destruction of the Jewish people and she discusses the importance that poetry can play in "remembering what one never knew."

Anti-racists cloud campus dialogue

By ED MORGAN

Jewish students on today's university campuses encounter not one but two kinds of racists: the racists and the anti-racists.

Anti-racism as a political message, an academic theory and a method of analyzing social and economic relations has, of course, many positive attributes. It exposes and deconstructs underlying hierarchies of dominance and subservience. Toronto's black community has put these theories to good use in expressing ongoing concerns over heavy-handed policing.

At the same time, the tendency of anti-racist theory and its practitioners to divide the world into a single, unifying paradigm of oppressors and oppressed, and to ascribe racial, national and ethnic identities to the two sides of this paradigm, has led to what one might call the "Durbanization" of campus politics. At the September 2001 UN-sponsored anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, the initial controversial resolutions insisted that Zionism is a form of racism while anti-Semitism is not.

Jews fit into this manifestation of anti-racism theory only on the "oppressor" side of the governing paradigm. Unfortunately, in this polemic, if the facts don't fit the theory, the facts change rather than the theory. The Centre for Integrative Anti-Racism Studies at OISE exhibited this tendency last spring when it circulated a petition decrying the "massacre" and "atrocities beyond belief" allegedly perpetrated by Israeli forces in Jenin, despite the fact that human rights organizations had already confirmed that no such massacre took place. The true facts, it seems, did not fit the paradigm of oppressor and oppressed.

The penchant to blame the Jew as a member of the "ruling class" has, in turn, combined with undergraduate-style expressions of liberation in campus periodicals. This was manifest most recently in the Jan. 29 edition of the York University student newspaper Excalibur, which published a poem on the theme of servitude and the longing for freedom experienced by oppressed peoples. The poem, written in a form of verse reminiscent of the "socialist realism" school of art, began with a reminder of historic slavery: "From the shores of West Africa to the New World we struggle."

The poem went on to evoke present-day repression, culminating in a restatement of the anti-racist paradigm that is becoming all too familiar in its pandering to gross stereotypes: "Institutionalized slavery still exists except it's now written down into books/ You have to be white or a Jew for the pendulum to shift in your favour."

In an academic year that started with a rowdy anti-Israel crowd aborting former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu's appearance at Concordia University, and whose winter term kicked off with York University threatening to cancel a lecture by U.S.-based political analyst Daniel Pipes, it is understandable that the mantra adopted by many Jewish campus advocacy groups is that of free speech. Pro-Israel viewpoints have with increasing frequency been edited out of university political debate by means of violent protest and insensitive administrative measures, and one must constantly be vigilant that the loudest voice on campus not be permitted to drown out other points of view.

However, a denial of space for rational assessments of Israel's policies is less frequent in the prevailing atmosphere than is the proliferation of hyperbolic and irrational anti-Israel commentary. In order for campuses to live up to their ideals of free speech, there certainly must not be censorship of any one political viewpoint. But it is equally important that there not be an excess of any one viewpoint, causing a chill on all who oppose it.

The sheer quantity of anti-Israel programs, courses, brochures, posters, banners, guest lecturers, newspaper articles, photo exhibits, rhetoric and even graffiti found on some campuses can present an overwhelmingly hostile environment for Jewish and Israeli students. This is the case even when no one statement or publication or poster or speaker is offensive on its own. The aggregate effect of expressible, if highly debatable, condemnations of Israel presents perhaps the most difficult campus problem of all. To appreciate the problem, one need only imagine the impact of a similarly obsessive campaign condemning Pakistani, Chinese, Jamaican or other governments and societies that represent minority student populations.

Indeed, this problem, when levelled at Jews, is at the heart of the currently prevalent anti-racism theme. While at times the message surfaces as blatantly antagonistic, more often it plays subtly on the theories of identity politics that divide the world simplistically into an evil overclass and a noble underclass. Doctrinaire versions of these theories move easily from analysis to accusation, making for an undercurrent of prejudice – a "tainted atmosphere," in human rights terms – against those identified with the dominant group. It is here that Jews are most vulnerable. No student or ethnic group should have to bear such a message in the course of higher education.

Ed Morgan is a law professor at the University of Toronto and is chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Get high school students the help they need

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Your son or daughter is struggling in school. Math has become difficult and English is frustrating. These are core courses and a low mark may affect where your son or daughter heads after high school and you want to help.

What should you do?

This is one of many questions parents with teens ask every day, yet finding the answer may be daunting.

But it shouldn't be, says Paul Shaviv, director of education at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT).

"We have a philosophy of teacher-parent communication where we encourage our teachers to notify parents," Shaviv said in a recent interview at his CHAT office.

"If a student has done something very well, we encourage teachers to let parents know. Conversely, if a student has not done well, we also encourage teachers to let parents know so nothing comes as a surprise."

Students who are especially challenged by certain courses may want to go for extra help. At CHAT, "one specified period during the week is set aside for extra help," Shaviv said.

If problems persist, a guidance counselor may intervene, as "their role in school is to keep track of the student's academic progress," Shaviv said.

Shaviv also noted that CHAT has a team of teachers who work at a learning centre to provide one-on-one remediation for students.

In some cases, the need for extra help may be due to a learning disability.

Doreen Levine, a former principal of United Synagogue Day School and now the head of special education at Thornhill Secondary School, said learning disabilities come in many shapes and forms.

She noted that in the public school system, students with learning disabilities are usually identified in elementary school through a psychological assessment.

"Some students have a specific, identifiable reason that might interfere with them learning to their potential," Levine said.

For instance, a student who is primarily a visual learner likely won't thrive in a classroom where the teacher only lectures. "They may not effectively process the information they receive in the classroom well, or they don't plan and/or organize well," she said.

Special education teachers help students improve in areas such as study skills, writing skills and personal management skills by holding learning strategies courses.

These courses teach students to identify their own learning style and show them how to be successful in school by improving in certain areas and capitalizing on their talents. For some students, particularly in the areas of math, science and English, a special education teacher can come directly to the classroom.

Students can also approach special education teachers during or after school.

Special education students are encouraged to "advocate for themselves" by telling the teacher about their needs and asking for extended time on tests or assignments if that is necessary, Levine said.

"If they use the right methodology, accommodations and work hard, there's no reason why they can't get 90s," she said.

There are some occasions when teachers and students don't see eye to eye. It could be disagreements over grades or perhaps a personality conflict, but if a student and teacher continue to duel even after a parent calls the teacher, what can be done?

"You should be able to resolve it, but if you can't, then the student would go to guidance," said veteran Thornhill Secondary School teacher Stephen Fish.

"Guidance is there as the student's advocate." Fish said that if the problem is intractable, parents should contact the school principal, who may either deal with the situation directly or delegate the problem to a vice-principal.

"Ultimately, you would get some kind of conference going," Fish said.

What if a parent has a question about the curriculum?

Curriculum in public schools and general studies courses at both CHAT campuses are set by the provincial Ministry of Education.

Shaviv said parents rarely have curriculum-related concerns, but if they do, they can contact whomever they are most comfortable with.

That would normally be the course teacher or perhaps the head of the department.

For Jewish studies, Shaviv said he establishes the curriculum in consultation with the school's faculty.

The Jewish studies courses are all accredited by the ministry, and the school's board of directors has an education committee that "has the duty of ensuring the quality of the curriculum delivered," Shaviv said.

One area that differs between private and public schools is discipline.

In Ontario, the disciplinary process that is mapped out by the Education Act does not apply to private schools. However, both the province and CHAT have specific codes of conduct.

Shaviv said if a parent and teacher communicate about a student's poor behaviour and the problem continues, the school has vice-principals that deal with those situations.

Similarly, vice-principals are also usually contacted by a teacher in the public school system if discipline is an issue.

Whatever your question may be, there is someone in your child's school, whether it is a teacher, department head, guidance counselor or administrator who can help you.

All you have to do is ask.

The hardest questions in university aren't on the exam.

What's the right school and program for me? Where will my degree take me?

I have lots of interests – how do I choose a major?

How do I get into a professional school?

I always thought I wanted to be an xxx... but now I'm not sure; what else can I do?

Everyone always told me to keep my options open – so, now what?

High school participation in Birthright a one-time thing

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A pilot program that saw hundreds of Jewish high school students from Canada participate in the winter Birthright trip to Israel will not be repeated.

The project is being considered a one-time event that went beyond Birthright's original mandate to focus on young people between 18 and 26, said Elizabeth Sokolsky, vice-president of education and operations for Birthright.

An exception was made to accommodate a number of high schools whose Israel experience programs had been cancelled, she said, adding their participation in Birthright was made possible by a one-time grant from a philanthropist who wishes to remain anonymous.

Students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot in Toronto, Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg and five Montreal high schools joined university-age participants on the mid-winter trip to Israel.

Birthright is a four-year old project conceived by philanthropists Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt to bring young Jews to Israel for the first time to strengthen their bonds with the Jewish state. It is jointly sponsored by the government of Israel, 14 Diaspora philanthropists and Jewish community federations.

The high school students' participation in Birthright was prompted by a request from a Montreal school last summer. Other Canadian schools followed suit and after some discussions, Birthright agreed to make an exception for the teens.

From the perspective of Sheldon Friedman, principal of CHAT's Wilmington branch, the 10-day trip was a resounding success. About 130 students from CHAT's 290-member Grade 12 class participated in an itinerary that combined education, spirituality and just plain fun.

Friedman said the trip was "a transformational experience" for his young charges. "It changed their whole perspective on Israel and what is going on there.

"They realized that CNN doesn't have exclusive rights to reality. They were quite taken aback that life goes on there."

One highlight for the teens was a rally at the Jerusalem Convention Centre that was addressed by Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. Another was a "mifgash," a get-together with 28 kids from Eilat and Alot, Toronto's sister communities in Israel.

The Israelis joined the Canadians on their buses for 2½ days, giving the two groups an opportunity to bond, Friedman said.

"What impressed our kids was that they're thinking about going to university, and [the Israelis] are thinking about going into the army," he said.

An educational component was an important part of the itinerary, Friedman said.

A visit to an inter-disciplinary school in Herzliyah where a professor discussed Israel's terrorist threat was a valuable session, particularly since some students had asked the school to help them develop tools to counter anti-Israel agitation when they get to university, he said.

The CHAT trip also included a session on community service in which the teens updated the labelling and batteries in gas-mask kits and repackaged them.

In addition to its educational aspects, the trip included hiking, cliff climbing, nature trail walks, visits to kibbutzim, Jerusalem, the Western Wall, Yad Vashem and a pre-dawn climb up Masada.

A couple of weeks after his return, Shael Markin, 17, was still excited about the trip. "The whole experience was great," he said.

CHAT students get ready for a trip to Israel.

"Masada was just incredible. We saw the sun rise at Masada.

"It was great having your best friends there. It's a great way to finish off high school," he said, adding "most kids who didn't go regretted they didn't go."

Randi Bergman, 17, said she had always wanted to go to Israel, "because everybody raves about it."

She said she felt a special connection to the country "the minute I got off the plane. You see how great the land is and you understand why everybody's been fighting for it.

"I now have a special connection and love for the country I didn't have before," Bergman said.

"Some things were fun, others were spiritual. Sometimes you cry, sometimes you laugh. There were just so many different things."

Friedman said the Birthright trip combined a very successful Israel experience with a valuable school experience.

"We stayed together, we had lots of activities as a school. We prayed together, we ate together and we were together as a group the whole time."

Course gives educators tools 'to lead a Jewish school'

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Last November, 19 day school principals, vice-principals, administrators and teachers completed a Jewish day school principal certification course, a unique program that combined Judaic and secular components.

The 16-month program, under the auspices of York University's faculty of education and the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE), brought together participants from nine Toronto day schools representing all segments of the community.

The graduates – about two thirds of whom were women – received a York University certificate that is recognized by the BJE.

Alex Pomson of York's education faculty spearheaded the program's creation. "We feel that it constitutes an important initiative that builds on York University's long-running relationship with the Jewish community," he said.

York education professor Rachael Turkienicz said she helped put together the program based on the Ministry of Education's Principal's Qualification Program (PQP), which is recognized by the Ontario College of Teachers and is also offered through York (and other universities).

"Although the Jewish Principals Certification Program is not recognized by the college of teachers in Ontario, it does parallel their program and adds to it the Judaic component – particularly the training and expertise necessary to lead a Jewish school," Turkienicz said.

There were three facilitators – Marta Le Grady, a retired elementary school principal in the public school system; Mark Fenwick, a superintendent in the Catholic school system; and Brian Krasman, a retired administrator who worked in both the public and Jewish day school systems, who added the Judaic component.

The requirements for the course were five years of teaching experience and a recommendation from a superior. Applicants also underwent an interview process.

"We wanted to focus on people in the day schools and help them grow in their leadership skills," Krasman said.

"The uniqueness of this program was having a forum where current and future administrators from a broad spectrum of Jewish schools had an opportunity to learn and study together."

The program's Judaic modules were developed with the input of principals who meet regularly at the BJE to discuss matters of concern. Many experts on a variety of topics spoke to participants.

Krasman said the class met every other week and attended two summer retreats. In addition to classroom sessions, there was an Internet component and a practicum in which participants had to initiate a change at their school and report back on the results.

"The networking that it created is phenomenal," Krasman said. "Now if [program graduates] have a concern on a professional basis, they can call on someone across the philosophical lines."

Elysa Cohen, principal of the egalitarian Downtown Jewish Day School (DJDS), was one of the participants. A graduate of the Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, she holds a master's degree in education, with a major in administration.

She worked as a teacher at the Toronto Heschel School and had applied for the PQP course, she said, but some classes were held on Saturdays and she chose to wait for a course with Sunday classes.

While waiting, in the spring of 2000, she accepted the position of principal at the DJDS. Turkienicz, who had been a co-ordinator at the Toronto Heschel School, suggested that Cohen apply for the Jewish principals program.

"As a young and new principal, just having the opportunity to meet other day school administrators and leaders and developing both a personal and professional relationship with them was extremely important to me," Cohen said.

The program gave participants an opportunity to get advice and support on real-life issues and was "an opportunity to take a step back and look at the responsibility of being a leader," she said.

"The city should be proud that we offer such a course. We each came from different schools and philosophies and the walls came down. We were so comfortable together. It was a unique opportunity."

Others echoed her feelings.

Henya Schechter is the principal of the Toronto Jewish Academy-Ohr Menachem, an Orthodox school with small classes that teaches Judaic subjects in English and attracts mainly children from non-observant homes.

She said she enrolled in the program to obtain her principal's certification.

"I knew I would learn things that will help me in my career. One of the most important things I gained is getting to know so many other educators and to be able to network, seek advice and assistance, and to put a face to a name."

She said that although there were differences in philosophies among program participants, "We had no problem communicating in a very professional manner. We felt free to share."

The valedictorian of the graduating class was Gail Baker, principal of the arts-based multi-sensory Toronto Heschel School. She said she took the course because "I was in the role of principal and I thought it would be a useful thing to obtain certification.

"And it was helpful to get to know the other school leaders and work together in a collaborative way and not a competitive way. Our main focus was to help and support each other.

"We realized that we had more in common than divides us. We all believe in the critical importance of Jewish education in klal Yisrael."

Turkienicz said plans are under way to run the course again, but the start date is yet to be determined.

Tutoring is the perfect solution for students who. . .

- ☑ need just a little extra help with school work
- ☑ work better in a one-on-one situation
- ☑ find a large, noisy classroom distracting
- ☑ need to learn at their own pace, or in their own learning style
- ☑ need to be challenged to hold their interest
- ☑ have difficulty relating to their teachers

I've seen people who never thought they were good at math excel with Sarah's guidance and ask for more!

-A. Harris, University of Western Ontario

And the right tutor makes all the difference!

After going to several tutors to help me with geometry, I was finally lucky enough to find Sarah. I can honestly say that Sarah has made a world of difference in my life this year, and I am extremely grateful for everything that she has taught me and for having had the opportunity to know her.

-E. Silver, Grade 12

As a guidance counselor, Sarah was knowledgeable and current with all aspects of schooling. She directed me to specific programs of study she felt would interest me. To say the least, she knew exactly what she was talking about, and thanks to her I am in the right school, in the right program, taking the right classes.

Jewish students face tough campus environment

By ZAC KAYE

"Jewish Students across Canada are dealing with the greatest threat to their individual civil liberties ever seen in this country."

"Universities are about civil discourse, about inquiry and debate; they are in the vanguard of how we perceive in western civilization what a free society is supposed to represent."

How, in 2003, can the two preceding sentences run together? The answer, unfortunately, is a sad reflection of the state of many of our university and college campuses today, where mutual respect and tolerance seem to no longer be important. This is especially true if you are a Jewish student, and even more so if you are open and demonstrative in your support of Israel.

Fortunately, not all universities and colleges in Canada put up with such intolerance. Indeed, at many universities, including the University of Toronto, special efforts have been made by members of the campus community, led by the president of the university, to create an atmosphere of tolerance and openness.

Many university and college presidents also find themselves under siege as they assert the right of the academy to be a place of civil discourse, as Lorna Marsden did recently in ensuring that controversial pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes was allowed to speak at York University.

In the wake of the United Nations World Conference Against Racism in Durban, South Africa, in August 2001, and with the spread of the anti-globalization movement and now the antiwar movement, there has been an ongoing attempt to isolate Israel in world forums. And in North America and Europe, there has been a concerted effort to deny supporters of Israel the right to speak and present their case on campus.

The biggest single challenge to Jewish students and those about to enter university is to be able to confront those who would deny them the right to express themselves as Jews, and who would deny them the right to promote Israel as a legitimate member of the family of nations.

Jewish students have to empower themselves while in high school to prepare for what might greet them on campus, because as they move from their sheltered surroundings to university and college campuses, they will, for the first time in their lives, be forced to confront people who challenge their very legitimacy.

Passionate Palestinian students and their left-wing supporters will shout them down and accuse them of being racists and of supporting state terror. They will have to deal with, as many Jewish students already do, their own arguments being turned on their heads, and they will have to combat the notion of Israel as a pariah state.

Across the country, Jewish campus groups are working hard to ensure that freedom of speech is preserved and that Israel's case is presented. And it is not just a matter of being a high-profile campus activist, for many of the discussions about Israel take place in classrooms, dining areas, residence halls and, of course, the pages of campus newspapers.

But Jewish students are learning they are not alone in their struggle to ensure a level playing field in the debate.

The wider Jewish community is working hard to provide the human and material resources that Jewish students and their campus groups need.

Universities are about challenging ideas, about arguing and presenting your case, not shutting others down.

As this academic year winds down, current and incoming students should understand what entering the academy is about, and for most Jewish students in Canada, it is certainly about more than just getting a degree.

Despite all, 'gladness and joy'

In the guileless way that a young child can sometimes express a profound thought through innocence and playful musing, 9½-year-old Caroline Alpert, has poignantly depicted one of the key moments in the Book of Esther.

"And the city of Shushan rang with joyous cries. The Jews enjoyed light and gladness, happiness and honour. And in every province and in every city, when the king's command and decree arrived, there was gladness and joy among the Jews, a feast and a holiday." (8:15-17)

Editorial

And for that reason, Caroline's drawing is on page 1 of the paper this week. It whimsically conveys the feelings of "gladness and joy" that overwhelmed our ancient forebears in the days of the cruel and foolish King Achashverosh.

Seen through the prism of her young eyes and as yet untainted experiences, Caroline's drawing casts an inclusive light upon all of the Jewish people: all shapes, sizes, colours, walks of life, locations and affiliations.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Back From Model UN

TORONTO — Students from the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Yeshivat Or Chaim and Ulpanat Orot in Toronto, and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate in Winnipeg were among more than 500 students from 36 North American high schools who attended the 13th annual Yeshiva University National Model United Nations last month in Monticello, N.Y. Each school represented at least one country and each student sat on one of 15 committees to debate such topics as world health and disarmament.

ISRAEL

Dear Saddam...

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat has asked Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein for continued help fighting Israel. "Any kind of support and assistance from you in these difficult times will enable us to continue our persistence and resistance," Arafat wrote in a letter earlier this month to Saddam, according to the Washington, D.C.-based Middle East Media Research Institute. Arafat wished Saddam well in the looming U.S.-led war and said "hand in hand," Iraq and the Palestinians will march to Jerusalem.

Hamas Leader Nabbed

JERUSALEM — Israel arrested one of the founders of Hamas last week. Mohammed Taha was wounded when he was captured during an anti-terror raid in Gaza. The capture of Taha came as Israel intensified operations against Hamas.

Patriots Deployed

JERUSALEM — U.S. troops last week deployed American-made Patriot missile batteries in the Tel Aviv area as back-up protection if Iraq lobs missiles at Israel during a war with the United States. Israel's main defence against the potential Iraqi threat will be the Arrow missile, which can intercept missiles about 70 kilometres above the ground. The Patriot can hit missiles at an altitude up to 30 kilometres. Israel will be deploying more Patriot batteries, including two from Germany, in Haifa and near its nuclear plant in the Negev.

WORLD

Arafat Sued in France

PARIS — Seven French families living in Israel are suing Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat in France. The families, relatives of those killed or injured by Palestinian terror in the intifadah, are suing Arafat for sponsoring genocide and crimes against humanity.

Terror Condemned

ROME — Religious leaders should not condone terrorism, the Vatican and Israel's Chief Rabbinate said last week. Committing violence in God's name is a "profanation of religion," they said. The joint statement came after Vatican officials and Israeli religious leaders met last month near Rome.

Gay Debate Reopened

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement's rabbinical union formally asked the movement's legal body last week to study whether homosexuality is allowed under Jewish law. Rabbi Reuven Hammer, president of the Rabbinical Assembly, said he asked the movement's law and standards committee to "revisit" its 1992 ruling upholding the biblical injunction against homosexuality. Rabbi Hammer, an ex-officio member of the committee, said he did not specify whether it should examine ordination of gays and lesbians, same-sex commitment ceremonies or its policy on gay and lesbian rabbinical students, but asked the panel to "reread its ruling and decide what, if anything, they want to do with it."

New York Kosher Law Struck Down

NEW YORK — Up to 17 U.S. states may have to join New York in changing kosher consumer enforcement statutes after the U.S. Supreme Court in effect killed the state's model law.

The high court last week refused to hear a case between a Long Island, N.Y., butcher and the state's Department of Agriculture and Markets, ending a last-ditch appeal to save the 88-year-old law, which was twice declared unconstitutional, most recently last May by an appeals court in Manhattan.

By bringing suit against the state, brothers Brian and Jeff Yarmeisch, the owners of Commack Self-Service Kosher Meats, have essentially neutralized its agriculture department's Kosher Law Enforcement Division and perhaps its counterparts in other states, which they insist was not their intention.

"We were only seeking to stop the harassment because we had supervision by a Conservative rabbi," Brian Yarmeisch, said. In their 1996 suit, the brothers argued that by repeatedly citing them for alleged infractions because they did not adhere to Orthodox kashrut standards, the state agency – administered by Orthodox and chassidic Jews – had strayed from consumer oversight into unconstitutional religious entanglement. The courts agreed, prompting the appeal by the state and Orthodox proponents of the bill.

Twenty states have kosher enforcement statutes, but after court challenges, New Jersey and Maryland modified theirslaws to allow merchants to declare which standard of kashrut they use. Last week, New York Gov. George Pataki proposed a similar new law based on "trade standards."

But some questioned whether the 17 other states will have to follow suit. Agudath Israel America said the high court's refusal to hear the case was not the same as ruling against the law and setting a precedent.

Jewish students attacked in York anti-war protest

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

An anti-war protester has been charged with assault following an incident at York University last Wednesday in which a Jewish student said she was grabbed and kicked.

In a separate incident during the same protest, another Jewish student said he was roughed up as protesters passed an information table he was manning in one of the university's central areas.

In the first incident, a female suspect was charged and released, said Sgt. Peter Duncan of Toronto Police Service, 31 Division.

The female suspect was among a group of more than 100 anti-war protesters occupying the ninth floor of York's Ross Building, where president Lorna Marsden's office is located.

Miriam Levin, a second-year student who is involved in several campus groups, including the pro-Israel grassroots Young Zionist Partnership (YZP), said the woman grabbed her arm and kicked her, trying to wrest her camera from her.

Levin said she and fellow student Hannah Wortzman were confronted by a crowd of protesters when they got off the elevator at the ninth floor, where Levin went to complain to Marsden about her treatment by the same protesters earlier that day.

When Levin arrived on campus at 7 a.m., protesters were already picketing and blocking traffic at the Keele St. entrance to York's campus.

"A guy in a keffiyah comes over to my car, and asks, 'What's your view on the war in Iraq?' " Levin told The CJN. Although she did not recognize him, he called her by name, perhaps recognizing her from her involvement in YZP. He also called her an "oppressor," she said.

Levin said she told him she was pro-war and that she wanted to go to class. She also took his picture so that she would be able to identify him later.

On the ninth floor, she said, he singled her out again, and other students began shouting "Fascist" and "Nazi" at her. Levin began taking more pictures.

She and Wortzman were separated by the crowd, but Wortzman managed to call 911 while Levin screamed for help.

"The whole thing was terrifying," Levin said.

Wortzman, who is in her final year, said that until last year she felt safe on campus.

The pair said they were able to escape by elevator with the help of a security guard stationed on the floor, but Levin and Wortzman said it took him about 20 minutes to intervene.

Police arrested the alleged attacker outside the building, and Levin decided to press charges after speaking to Len Rudner of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Levin said she had argued with the woman previously at YZP tables, but there had never been physical violence. She doesn't see the incident as being isolated, however. "It's a horrible situation for the Jewish students."

Police also took a report regarding what York's director of media relations Cim Nunn called "inappropriate behaviour" by protesters toward neighbouring tables representing the Canadian Alliance Party and the YZP.

Second-year student Yaakov Roth, the York Alliance president who was staffing the party's table that morning in Vari Link, a central area, said about 200 protesters marched by his table "banging a drum, screaming and yelling, but nothing specifically against us." Suddenly, he said, a female student (not the one arrested for assault) lunged at him and YZP president Paul Cooper.

Roth said a male student shoved him, and protesters tried to set their American flag on fire, then stole the flag. The table was shoved and their banner torn down, Roth said. He was not injured.

Roth said he did not know whether he was attacked and Cooper wasn't because he wears a kippah and Cooper doesn't, or whether he was just closer to the protesters. Both Cooper and Roth are active in YZP and the Alliance party.

The incidents came a month after pro-Palestinian students tried to stop pro-Israel academic Daniel Pipes from speaking at York.

"There are limits to free speech," Rudner told The CJN. "We understand that there has to be free exchange of ideas and that sometimes that will excite passions, but that limits have to be placed. If protesters are unable to place limits on themselves… it is the responsibility of the university."

Nunn said York is investigating whether anyone involved in the incidents violated the university's code of behaviour.

Charged with assault is Sara Amash. Another protester was charged with mischief, and three others were arrested and later released without charge, all for blocking traffic, police said.

The politics of Purim

It is simply impossible to adequately thank all the young artists who submitted entries to this year's Purim poster contest. But we must try.

More youngsters than ever participated in the contest. As a result, we received more dazzling pictures than ever – wonderfully emphatic, colourful and imaginative pictures – making the task of choosing merely two drawings from each grade very difficult.

Despite the difficulty, however, we made our decisions and the results appear in this week's centrefold poster for all our readers to see.

It is very important that everyone who sent us a picture know how grateful we are to you and how much we appreciate your effort. Not one single picture from the hundreds we received was unworthy of appearing in the poster. But we had room for only 12 pictures.

Due to production schedule pressures, not all the names of those who received an honourable mention appear on the poster. The following names "complete" the list:

- Ryan
- Zev
- Austin, Tobe
- Azouri, Jonathan
- Belete, Jonathan
- Gasch, David
- Glicksman, Jenna

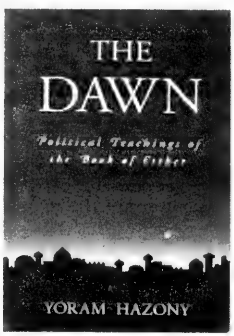
In time for the holiday of Purim, the Shalem Center, an institute for Israeli social thought and public policy in Jerusalem, has published an interesting new work by Yoram Hazony, entitled The Dawn: Political Teachings of the Book of Esther.

Hazony is the centre's president, an articulate spokesperson and careful thinker from the centre-right of Israel's political spectrum. His most recent book, The Jewish State: The Struggle for Israel's Soul, is an aggressive polemic that argues for the return of classical Jewish values and Zionist content to correct what Hazony perceives are the current misdirections in Israeli society, one of the key symptoms of which was the failed Oslo peace experiment.

Hazony's new work is a primer, a manual-of-sorts, ostensibly for Diaspora communities, that purports to provide a proper understanding of the dynamics of political power and the wielding of influence by Jewish community leaders upon the elite decision-makers within the power structure.



But it is, too, a polemic, inasmuch as it is Hazony's personal parshanut (commentary) on the Book of Esther that elucidates and expands upon essentially one theme: the story is a paradigm for the political lessons that Jews must learn to live with more securely as a minority in a foreign host culture.

Hazony recasts the narrative of the Book of Esther, with its depictions of the struggles against idolatry, assimilation and anti-Semitism, especially as embodied by the biblical tribal figures of Amalek, as a story for modern times.

"What argument can be made as against [assimilation] to a defeated and dispirited Jewry, scattered to the corners of the world and no longer privy to the world of God?" Hazony writes. "In making its political argument, the narrative of Esther consciously responds on historical, religious and theological battlegrounds as well, offering answers which are among the most daring and ultimately the most successful in Jewish history."

Hazony covers a great deal of intellectual and historical territory. He places the Book of Esther within a broad context of Jewish archetypes of survival from Joseph and Moses to the community leaders and scribes of Persia at the time of the destruction of the First Temple.

Hazony makes the case that the many political lessons of the Book of Esther apply today no less than they did in her time. And thus he implores Jews around the world to adopt his conclusions rather urgently.

"The most remarkable aspect of the book is not God's absence itself, but the fact that this absence does not induce defeat and despair. Quite the contrary, in fact: Mordechai and Esther prove that even in the grim new universe of the dispersion, the most fearsome evils may yet be challenged and beaten – so long as man himself is willing to take the initiative to beat them… Man may still find out what God wishes of him, but he will not be given the answers; he will have to seek them."

Germany urged to drop charges against Zundel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Move would expedite deportation, Wiesenthal Centre says

The Simon Wiesenthal Centre is proposing an unusual – and counterintuitive – approach to dealing with Nazi apologist and asylum-seeker Ernst Zundel.

The Centre is urging the government of Germany to suspend its charges of hate incitement against Zundel, thereby undercutting his claim for refugee status in Canada.

Leo Adler, the Centre's director of national affairs in Canada, believes that in the absence of the charges, Zundel's claim that he faces political persecution in his native Germany would collapse, opening the door for his immediate deportation.

Once back in Germany, Zundel would be forced to comply with that country's tough anti-incitement laws. Should he deviate from a narrow path, German authorities would be free to revive the charges against him.

Adler said he has broached the idea with the German ambassador in Ottawa and was told the suggestion had been forwarded to Berlin. But he said he was also told the suggestion would have more weight if Canadian government authorities lined up behind it.

Adler subsequently wrote to the Ministers of Justice and Citizenship and Immigration asking them to support his position. Immigration Minister Denis Coderre told reporters in Guelph he would not intervene in Zundel's refugee determination process.

Heribert Adelt, the German embassy's press officer, said there are "problems" with Adler's suggestion.

"There is a special principle in German law. If anybody commits a crime, the prosecutor has to prosecute. He can't lean back and do nothing. If there's a crime, he has the duty to prosecute," Adelt said.

At the current time, Germany sees the Zundel case "as a Canadian process. The Canadians have to decide what to do," Adelt said.

Ottawa, meanwhile, has placed Zundel in detention in Thorold, Ont., and is preparing to make an argument that Zundel should be denied refugee status in Canada because he poses a security threat.

Twice during the 1990s, Zundel's applications for Canadian citizenship were turned down after the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) determined he posed a danger to Canadian society.

In the summer of 2000, Zundel gave up Canadian residence and moved to Tennessee, saying he was fed up with Canada and that he did not intend to return.

But on Feb. 5 he was arrested at his home by U.S. Immigration and Naturalization Service officers on a visa violation and placed in custody. He was subsequently dumped at the Canadian border where he immediately made a refugee claim. Zundel alleges he faces persecution in his native Germany, which he left in 1958, for his political views.

At his most recent hearing before a member of the Immigration and Refugee Board in Niagara Falls on Feb. 28, Zundel was ordered to remain in custody until his next detention review 30 days later.

IRB member K. Thomson ruled that "the minister [of citizenship and immigration] has provided ample information which would certainly indicate there is reasonable suspicion that [Zundel] may pose a danger to the national security of Canada."

Thomson said that finding is sufficient to keep Zundel behind bars. But, he continued, "I probably would have also found you [Zundel] to be a danger to the public."

Speaking in his own defence, Zundel argued he had never been convicted in Canada of any criminal offence.

He also rejected the Crown's contention he poses a security threat, arguing instead that CSIS opened his mail and yet allowed a pipe bomb to be delivered to him. "They set me up for assassination," he said.

Zundel also dismissed the charges against him in Germany, describing the German government are "quislings," a reference to the pro-Nazi puppet government in wartime Norway.

He also claimed he never counselled violence, saying "I am an advocate of Gandhi's way of self-liberation."

Crown attorney Donald MacIntosh, who prosecuted the Konrad Kalejs deportation case, dismissed Zundel's claims. Zundel's allegations against CSIS, he said, "are patently ridiculous and have no evidentiary basis whatsoever and are about as ridiculous as his linkage between his cause and that of Gandhi. Gandhi never supported the Nazi cause and was horrified by all that anti-Semitism represents."

Journalist finds a looking glass world in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

On a recent trip to Israel, Globe and Mail columnist Margaret Wente found two different versions of reality.

"It's a looking glass world," said Wente, a non-Jew who visited the country for the first time in order to "make some sense out of the confusing, depressing situation."

Her purpose, she said at a lecture last week at Holy Blossom Temple, was to "send home a message from the front lines about how people on both sides experience life.

"The weird thing is that the people on both sides look identical. [Although] they live in two different universes, the teenagers look like twins."

To try to understand the Palestinian mentality, she said, she arranged a visit with the parents of Aayat Al-Akhras, a 17-year old girl who blew herself up in a Jerusalem shopping centre last March.

She killed two people – a guard who tried to stop her, and Rachel Levy, a 17-year old Israeli girl "who looked just like her. Both girls were brilliant and accomplished, and both were described by their parents as model daughters," Wente said.

Aayat's parents, who live in a two-room house with their 11 children, have turned their home into a shrine to their daughter, said Wente.

On one wall were photographs of Aayat, one in her suicide bombing gear, and one in western clothing, Wente said. "She had two worlds to choose from, and she chose the wrong one."

Aayat's mother had tried to stop her daughter from becoming more radical, but after a neighbour was killed by Israeli troops, Aayat got in touch with a local terrorist band and persisted until they accepted her as a suicide bomber, she said.

"She was not pressured, and she did not waver. She spent her last night studying for a test at school, and the next morning she wrote her test, which her father discovered she got [100 per cent]."

When Wente asked one of Aayat's friends at school if she could do the same thing, "the friend said that 'we could all do it, but we don't have the courage.'

"The principal of the school told me that everyone viewed Aayat as a hero, and a teacher said that 'Palestinians are desperate. If innocent Israelis have to die, that is their own fault.' I heard that dozens and dozens of times."

At Palestinian Watch in Jerusalem, Wente viewed a video reel in which she saw Palestinians celebrating the life of a 12-year-old martyr who died in 2000. "There was a full-screen message recruiting children to 'follow me to paradise,'" she said.

"There is a school and a university course named after one suicide bomber. That is a part of the story that the world does not see."

Suicide bombing has been the Palestinians' weapon of choice, Wente said, "but the strategy has been a miserable failure. The world has condemned it, and Israel has not gone away. They have stepped up security and made life hell for the Palestinians.

"In Israel life is relatively normal, so Aayat died for nothing," said Wente, a two-time National Newspaper Award winner for column-writing.

On a positive note, she said, in a meeting with Aharon Barak, chief justice of the Supreme Court of Israel, "he reminded me that Israel has faced annihilation for 55 years, and is still here.

"He said 'there will never be absolute peace, but eventually the Palestinians will come around. It won't be perfect, but it will be okay. There are a lot of people who saw the country through worse. We will prevail.'"

FRIENDSHIP EXTRAVAGANZA:

A pre-Purim event at Chabad@Flamingo ushered in the holiday spirit and helped familiarize "Friendship Circle" children with the story, joy and celebration of this wonderful festival. The "Friendship Circle," a program launched last year by Chabad Lubavitch with start-up funding from the Trillium Foundation of Ontario, enlists teenagers to volunteer as mentors to children with special needs. The children and their siblings came from across the GTA for an afternoon of fun and crafts imbued with the Purim spirit. They baked hamantashen, designed masks, created their own noisemakers and watched a juggler. Each child was also given a fun and educational Purim CD.

Despite all, 'gladness and joy'

And that, we venture, is precisely how God and our ancient sages had intended the holiday of Purim to be celebrated – by the entirety of our people, with full entitlement for all of us to feelings of gladness and joy.

The world, however, in the words of the poet, is lately "too much with us," mitigating, if not displacing altogether feelings of gladness and joy. We are weighed down and bowed of shoulder from constant worry, perpetual anger and too frequent shedding of tears.

Last week in Israel, 18 people were killed by Hamas murderers. Scores more were wounded, many of them debilitated for the rest of their lives.

Last week at the United Nations, the debate resumed over how best to deal with Saddam Hussein. In truth, the debate has been more surreal than real. Its only discernible achievement has been the driving of a deep wedge between the two competing alignments of the western nations, and probably, the mortal plunging of a stake into the heart of the United Nations itself.

As the American-led alliance of forces has assembled in the Persian Gulf, world opinion has turned against the United States and towards Iraq. Saddam is laughing. Neither his depredations nor his scheming, neither his cruelty nor his blatant, in-your-face lies have managed to alienate the affections of his defenders.

And of course, irrespective of the debate at the United Nations, Israel stands in harm's way. If the U.S. launches a military campaign, Saddam will undoubtedly try to harm Israel as he did 12 years ago. The Hezbollah forces in south Lebanon will likely try to enter the fray, to "help" him, by launching some or all of the more than 8,000 missiles pointed at Israel. If the United States does not launch its military campaign, Saddam will merely continue to develop, hide and distribute his insidious weapons of mass destruction and terror to agents and hostile countries frothing in frenzied hope at the prospect of harming Israel.

The comparison is too ready-at-the-reach, and it is overly simplistic to say that Saddam is a modern-day Haman. But he does represent undisguised evil in the same way that Haman did. He would if he could – as would Hamas, Islamic Jihad and Hezbollah – "destroy, massacre and exterminate all the Jews, young and old, children and women." (3:13) It is the certain truth of this knowledge that weighs us down.

But there is an other equally certain truth at play in the mystery of our lives that we must not forget: Israel and its God stand in their way.

And so, despite the bowing of our shoulders, we too must set this time aside for joyous cries. "In every province and in every city, [where Jews live, let there be] gladness and joy, a feast and a holiday." Chag samayach.

We need to support Israel

Having recently returned from a trip to Israel to visit my children and grandchildren, I feel it my duty to attempt to encourage others to visit Israel.

Israel desperately needs us. Isolated, condemned and criticized, it has also seen Jewish tourism all but vanish. This should give us pause for deep soul searching.

The Israeli economy is dependent on the tourist industry. At a time when the global high-tech industry, in which Israel was foremost in the world, has collapsed, it is now also suffering from a dramatic drop in tourism. Hotels are empty, many have closed down, restaurants are empty except for the local people, tourist spots and resorts are empty and many Israelis are unemployed.

We owe it to Israelis to visit and to fill the hotels and restaurants in order to show that they do not stand alone and that they can earn their own living and not rely only on our charitable donations.

Aside all the above, Israel is a wonderful place to visit.

Textbooks teaching hate

I was appalled when I read about the hate that saturates Saudi textbooks (CJN, "Saudi textbooks filled with hatred of West, Jews," Feb. 20). As a student in Grade 12, I am fully aware just how much my peers and I take our textbooks as representative of "the truth." We are taught that our textbooks contain historically and morally accurate information.

To think that my counterparts in Saudi Arabia, and by extension, the Palestinian Authority (PA), are learning ugly lies from their textbooks, such as "Jews are wickedness in its very essence," makes my blood run cold. When Arab students are brainwashed to believe that the only good Jews are dead ones, is it any wonder that their responses as adults are suicide bombings and killings?

Textbooks are a powerful tool. They shape the thoughts and opinions of young people all over the world. The fact that Saudi Arabian students are being taught that Jews are evil and that Israel does not even exist is disgusting to me, as it should be to all morally upright, freedom-seeking individuals.

I believe we can never really achieve true peace with our Arab neighbours until we collectively recognize the tremendous authority that textbooks wield. For this reason, I think that even before negotiating and undergoing peace talks, permanent educational reforms must be made in the PA and Arab world. Maybe then peace can truly be achieved.

Different hats, one people

At my weekly shiur (class) this week, the rabbi asked, "What was the miracle of Purim?"

I answered as a joke that the biggest miracle was getting everyone to unite behind Mordechai and Esther when they said to fast, pray and fight Haman. But the more I thought about it, the more I thought it wasn't such a joke. How did Mordechai and Esther achieve such unity? Was it because the Jews had a smaller population then? Were we more concentrated in one section of the world?

I know that God can make miracles for us if He wants to, but do we have to make it so difficult for Him? Perhaps if we were more united in the little things, He would help us with the big things. We started getting fractured by what hats we wore. Now, it's what neighbourhood we live in or what street we live on. Remember that Haman also wore a different hat.

Weinfeld's comment illogical

I question the logic and consistency of Morton Weinfeld's argument in his column "From dissent to desertion" (CJN, March 6). I agree that the rejection of Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) rabbinical student Jill Jacobs' Torah commentary, which contained criticisms of Israel, is a "troubling example of heavy-handed censorship." But while Jacobs apparently does not explain what she means by the vague phrase "military operations," it is possible to interpret in a narrow way that Weinfeld would find acceptable.

But what really rankles is Weinfeld's leap to the conclusion that JTS rabbinic students – "dozens" now who are supporting Jacobs, perhaps more later – may soften in their support of Israel. Is it not clear that the issue in question is the government and its policies, and not Israel or the Jewish people? Jacobs' interpretation of Torah may differ from that of the Likud and its partners.

Weinfeld goes to some length to discuss demographic changes that have altered Israel's social and political culture, and the Israeli government, which "may increasingly come to reflect the wishes of these new Israeli voters," but he appears to have no tolerance for those who are disaffected by those changing wishes if they begin to articulate their frustration against blind allegiance. Is he not asking for unconditional support from Jacobs that he himself says no country deserves?

I think a more provocative subject would have been a discussion of the morality of the decision to reject Jacobs' commentary – subordinating free expression to Israeli ministry subsidies and pro-Israel JTS donors.

My Purim in Laos

By NAOMI ISCOVE

I sank back into the plump cushions on my wicker chair and smiled at my friends. The six of us were sitting together near the banks of the Mekong River last March. A light breeze tugged at our hair. The large orange sun sank slowly into the brown river water, changing the blue in the sky to shades of pink and purple. In the background, we could hear Laotian folk music being played on a radio. I sipped my fruit shake, enjoying this dream-world so far removed from my reality back in Canada. Time, deadlines and schedules did not exist here.

"Does anyone know what the date is today?" I wondered aloud.

My friend, Eilat, glanced at her wrist, forgetting that she had removed her watch weeks ago. She giggled and shrugged.

Noa spoke up, "I think it's the 24th, why?"

"Guys, it's Purim tomorrow!" Batshahar exclaimed, snapping to attention.

"You're kidding! Tomorrow?… We should celebrate!"

Noa sat upright in her chair. "For sure. But what can we do? We're in Laos, there's no synagogue here. I don't have a Megillah, do you?"

We all smiled at the thought of backpacking in Southeast Asia with a Megillah.

Eilat played with the idea. "No, I don't have a megillah, but we all know the story… Maybe we can plan a Purim seudah and dress up and tell the story without the Megillah."

"And we'll drink too?" Keren awoke from her daydreams and joined the conversation.

"Of course. It's a mitzvah to get drunk on Purim!" I grew nostalgic for the Purim parties in Montreal.

"OK… so how can we do this?" Our plans evoked Shai's curiosity.

"Eilat and I will make a huge salad," I offered. "Keren and Shai, you take care of the wine. Noa and Batshahar can get us fresh bread."

"But what about costumes?" Batshahar probed.

"We all have to make our own costumes," Eilat answered.

"And where will we have this seudah and party?" Noa asked.

"At the guest house. Don't worry, I'll explain it to the owners," I replied. "So it's set then? We're all in?"

All heads nodded agreement. We raised our fruit shakes and clinked them together.

Luang Prabang, the tiny riverside city we were in in northern Laos, has an entirely Buddhist population. It is one of the only cities in Southeast Asia that upholds the monks' tradition of circling the city in a long parade each morning at sunrise to collect rice and flowers from the townspeople. Aside from a few other Israeli tourists, my friends and I were the only Jews there – the only ones who knew that, the next night, Jews all over the world would be dressing up in costumes, reading the Megillah and drinking until they couldn't differentiate between "Blessed be Mordecai" and "Cursed be Haman."

We rode a tuk-tuk back to the guesthouse. The air was warm and humid. The night market bustled with activity. Music from the karaoke bars echoed in the air. Tourists wandered the streets buying banana roti, fruit shakes and fried noodles from street vendors.

When we arrived at the guesthouse, Noa and I approached the owner. "Tomorrow night is a Jewish holiday called Purim. We want to celebrate it here. Can we use the tables in the courtyard for our meal?"

The stout Laotian woman peered up at me, eyebrows raised. "What is the holiday about?"

"There was a horrible man who wanted to kill our people, but a courageous hero spoiled his plan and saved us." I explained.

"You celebrate how?" Her eyes opened wide.

"We'll dress up in costumes, eat a big meal, tell the story and have a party." Noa told her.

"OK for me. Thank you for asking." She smiled, bowed her head gently, and ambled back to her room.

The next day, Eilat and I battled the heat and crowds at Luang Prabang's open market. We bought carrots, cucumbers, tomatoes, beans, nana, lettuce, lemons, bananas, nuts and a pineapple, spending a total of 40,000 kip ($4 US). We lugged our heavy knapsack back to the guesthouse and dumped its contents onto the large wooden table in the middle of the courtyard.

Taking a step back, I surveyed our purchases. "Hmm… how are we going to wash all this stuff and turn it into a salad?"

"Ooh, I have an idea." Eilat jumped up and raced to our room. She returned carrying our dish detergent and her Swiss army knife. "My mom soaks vegetables in detergent to get rid of chemicals and stuff. She'll be so proud when I tell her we did this! Now… we just have to find a pot or something."

Our eyes darted around the courtyard.

"There's a tap around the back of the guesthouse, near the bathroom," I offered, "that's where Noa and Batshahar did their laundry yesterday."

The guesthouse owner appeared at the courtyard entrance and listened to our conversation.

"OK, so we can rinse the veggies under the tap, but we need to soak them with this." Eilat jiggled the detergent in her hand.

The owner hurried over to us and announced, "I help you! You wait here!" She waddled to the edge of the courtyard and disappeared into a shed. Seconds later, she reappeared, holding a large metal laundry basin. She placed it on the table and beamed at us. "This work for you!"

Eilat and I thanked her profusely and carried the basin to the tap. We filled it with water, plopped in the carrots, cucumbers, tomatoes, beans and lettuce, and added some dish detergent. I swished the water around in the bowl until large white suds materialized. Eilat grabbed a handful of suds and smeared them on my face. I did the same thing back to her. Collapsing in a fit of giggles, we gazed into the basin of vegetables.

"This is already the best Purim ever!" I snorted, "I can't wait for tonight!" Observing us from the side of the shed, the guesthouse owner scratched her head, shrugged her shoulders, and slipped back inside.

"This has to soak for half an hour. Let's go make our costumes!" Eilat jumped up and headed for the woods behind the guesthouse.

"Eilat, where are you going?"

"To get my costume! Don't follow me, Nom, it's a surprise!" She disappeared among the trees.

I stood up, brushed off my pants, and shuffled to our room, racking my brain for costume ideas. I opened my backpack and searched for inspiration. Out of the corner of my eye, I caught a glimpse of the guesthouse owner walking past my window. A long piece of checkered material covered her body. Her long black hair was piled on top of her head under a small, thin towel. She carried soap and a comb. Like many Laotian women, she bathed in the river down the street, rather than in the showers. I found some material my Thai friend had given me in Bangkok, and began creating my costume.

Eilat returned from the woods and hid something under the bed. Sweat dripped off her forehead, and her shirt clung to her body. "Humidity!" she grunted as she threw herself on the bed. We closed our eyes and fell asleep.

About an hour later, Eilat woke up with a start. "Nom! The vegetables!" We rushed outside to our laundry basin and found the owner frowning down at the soapy water.

"How you cut these?" she asked. Eilat proudly produced her Swiss army knife, but the owner continued to frown. "I help you!" She dashed to her room and returned with knives, forks, bowls, and plates.

"Thank you!" we gushed. We sat on the benches, poured the soapy water onto the ground and dried the vegetables. Batshahar and Noa returned from town with fresh bread, and joined us at the wooden table. Noa set up her minidisc player and we sang along to Israeli tunes while we worked. We peeled and cut and sliced the vegetables and then dumped them into the biggest of plastic bowls.

The guesthouse owner eyed us skeptically. Suddenly, she approached us, snatched the pile of beans that I was about to cut, exclaimed, "I help you!" and dashed back to the shed.

"What just happened?" Noa asked. We shrugged and leaned back to peek into the shed. The owner dropped the beans into a pot of water, one by one. "She's cooking the beans for us! I can't believe it!"

Keren and Shai arrived just as we were covering the salad. "We couldn't find wine so we bought this instead!" Keren announced, holding up a six-pack of Beer Lao. We arranged the table, placing the Beer Lao, fresh bread and giant salad in the centre, and distributing the forks, knives, and plates around them.

"Everyone shower, put on your costumes, and meet back here in an hour!" I called as I raced to my room.

An hour later, we returned to the courtyard. I wore my Thai material wrapped around my body and my towel on my head like a Laotian woman on her way to bathe in the river. Batshahar stuffed her sarong with rolled-up T-shirts to appear pregnant. Noa wore a sari and painted a red dot on her forehead like an Indian woman. Eilat tied a palm tree branch to her right arm and made a sling out of a bandana for her left arm. She was a bird with a broken wing. Keren and Shai arrived wearing jeans and T-shirts.

"You guys actually dressed up?" Shai chuckled.

"It's Purim! You better dress up too!" I shot back.

"Come on guys, don't be party poopers!" Eilat scolded, smoothing out the leaves of the palm branch on her arm. Keren and Shai retreated to their room. We heard arguing and laughing. Minutes later, they stumbled back to us.

"Happy Purim!" Keren giggled. "I dressed up as Shai and he dressed up as me!" She wore Shai's black jacket, yellow rainpants and plastic scuba mask. Shai wore Keren's tight rainbow-striped hat, red tank top and long pink skirt. His stomach bulged over his waist.

The guesthouse owner watched from the shed and offered to photograph us. We posed for her near the porch and in front of our homemade feast.

Then we headed to the table, and she and her family sat on the grass nearby to observe as we attempted to retell the Purim story.

I began: "Once upon a time, a king named Achashverosh was married to a woman named Vashti. He invited her to dance at his party, but she refused because he and his friends were drunk and obnoxious and she had self-respect."

Eilat took over for a few sentences, and Noa picked up where she left off. Batshahar, Keren and Shai participated as well. We drank a "l'chaim" when we mentioned Mordecai, and stamped our feet and booed when we said Haman.

When I ended the story with "Haman led the horse that Mordecai was riding through the streets, the people cheered, the Jews were saved and they all lived happily ever after," we all cheered and applauded.

Then the party began! Eilat turned the Israeli music on full blast and whipped the covering off the food. We invited the guesthouse owner and her family to join us. Together we devoured our dinner, drank our Beer Lao, told stories and jokes, sang along to Israeli tunes, and celebrated Purim – Laotian style.

Opinions

Who's talking? Who's listening?

Aside from MIT professor Noam Chomsky's visit last November, the political temperature at Hamilton's McMaster University has remained within a relatively tepid range over the past several months.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

But this changed dramatically during February.

First to appear on campus was Baker Abdel Munem, director of the General Delegation of Palestine in Canada. Then, a few days later, Leila Khaled Mouammar and Jaggi Singh, both "activists" from Concordia University in Montreal, were the featured guests. Mouammar is currently facing suspension from her university program, while Singh has apparently been banned from the Concordia campus for five years. Tagging along with them was Max Silverman, a high school student from Toronto, who heads up a group called "Jewish Youth Against the Occupation."

More recently, the McMaster Jewish Student Association and UJA Federation of Hamilton hosted Yossi Olmert, a professor of security studies at Bar-Ilan University.

Despite some initial concerns about security, each of the presentations actually went quite smoothly. All of the speakers, at their respective venues, delivered their respective messages, and even the ensuing question periods were relatively civil, perhaps even subdued. This is not to infer that the presenters were uninteresting or lacking in passion. Far from it.

Olmert gave his audience an unabashed and stirring lesson in modern Jewish history, focusing on Israel's legitimate rights and aspirations. Jewish students and members of the broader Jewish community turned out in respectable numbers to hear his talk, while attendance by the Arab community, whether from campus or elsewhere, was spotty at best.

By contrast, when the Palestinian supporters had their programs, what we heard is what we always seem to hear at such gatherings: lengthy diatribes that brazenly question the basic tenets of what we know as "our" history, mixed in with large chunks of even more blatant propaganda. And who attended these forums? Well, the rooms were filled with a large representation from the Arab community and as many, if not more, Jewish students and members of the Jewish community than attended Olmert's talk!

So, at the end of the day, we might seriously ask whether there really is any constructive purpose to all of this. From our Jewish students' and Jewish community's standpoint, absorbing what the Palestinian lobby has to say may well be a salutary lesson in what we're up against. But what should be even more instructive for both us and our students is that, for the most part, the "other side" seems unwilling to even show up and listen to what we have to say.

Granted, this is just one isolated series of observations at just one university, but I suspect that what we've seen at McMaster is not that dissimilar from what's been happening on other campuses as well.

How much worse it could be...

Later this month marks exactly 2½ years since the Palestinians launched their terrorist war of attrition against Israel. During that time, Israel has suffered dearly, losing at last count 735 men, women and children in countless attacks that also wounded some 5,000 others. In a tiny, closely-knit country like Israel, such a loss is devastating.

And yet, compared to what the terrorists intended, the casualties, as terrible as they are, are relatively low.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Most people abroad don't realize that the atrocities that have killed so many and so shaken the nation pale next to all the operations planned by Palestinian terror groups. Fortunately, the country's security services are on the case, heroically foiling many of them. Otherwise, the Israeli death toll since September 2000 would be in the thousands.

The world has little idea of what Israel is really up against. This is not surprising, given that the foreign media largely ignores the many terrorist plots averted by the Israel Defence Forces (IDF), the police and the General Security Services (GSS).

Since the current hostilities broke out, 98 Palestinians have blown themselves up in attacks aimed at slaughtering as many as Israelis as possible. During the same period, Israel has captured 85 would-be suicide bombers. In recent months, it has foiled an even higher proportion of planned attacks.

In February alone, the GSS prevented 57 Palestinian terrorist attacks, including 22 in which would-be suicide bombers and their dispatchers were arrested with huge amounts of weapons and explosives.

The other day, Jerusalem police revealed that in January they foiled an attempted mass terror attack on the city's main soccer stadium packed with fans.

Three weeks ago, IDF troops uncovered a huge Hamas bomb factory in the West Bank containing hundreds of kilograms of explosives and parts used for making bombs.

In mid-February, the GSS announced it had arrested a Gaza resident who was planning several bombing attacks and organizing others by suicide bombers. His intended targets: Be'er Sheva's Soroka Hospital, a bus of tourists in Mitzpe Ramon and IDF officers in the Negev.

In early February, the IDF arrested a Hamas member in Ramallah who had hidden a suitcase containing several explosive belts. He confessed to planning to wear one of them into Jerusalem on a suicide mission.

Two days before, the IDF found a 15-kilogram explosives belt hidden in a large mosque in the town of Taibeh. The IDF learned of the bomb after arresting two Islamic Jihad terrorists at a nearby roadblock. They confessed to hiding it for use later against an Israeli target.

At the same time, security sources revealed the IDF and the GSS foiled several attempted terror attacks planned for the Jan. 28 Knesset elections. The most ambitious was a plan by an Islamic Jihad cell in Jenin to detonate four booby-trapped cars at different locations simultaneously inside Israel.

A week earlier, Border Police aborted a similar bombing attempt near Wadi Ara when they captured a jeep laden with 400 kg of explosives that Islamic Jihad had dispatched for a massive attack.

In December, three east Jerusalem members of Islamic Jihad were charged with planning to launch a missile at a helicopter arriving at the Knesset and set off a bomb near the Prime Minister's residence across town.

The same week, security sources said a terrorist cell had planned to assassinate former Jerusalem mayor Ehud Olmert and to carry out a suicide bombing at the city's central bus station. These are just some of the plans aborted in recent months.

A few days ago, Jerusalem Police Chief Mickey Levy said that in 2002, there were 41 terror attacks in the city including 17 suicide bombings, plus 11 attempted suicide attacks that police thwarted.

The week before, National Police Commissioner Shlomo Aharonishky released figures for 2002 showing that police foiled 45 terror attacks and prevented the explosion of 236 bombs inside Israel in some 550 counter-terrorist actions.

As bad as the situation is, I shudder to think what it would be if not for members of the country's security services. They risk their lives every day against those hell-bent on the mass murder of Israelis. Thirty months into this war, I salute the courage and devotion of Israel's soldiers, police and other security personnel. They deserve our praise and gratitude.

Can the Arab world follow Asia's path to freedom?

Forty years ago, political and economic conditions in Asia (except Japan) and in the Middle East (except Israel) shared a number of characteristics: Both regions were deeply embedded in the gloomy and seemingly hopeless Third World. Governments were controlled by small and corrupt elites supported by the military and other security forces, there was no room for tolerance or pluralism and the economies were stagnant. Violence and conflict were widespread, both internally and between nations.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

Since then, however, the countries of Asia, including China and India, have managed to break out of this economic and political prison, but the Arab Middle East remains stuck where it was in the 1960s. With the partial exception of the petroleum exporting countries in the Gulf, poverty has become even more deeply embedded, and the political systems remain hermetically sealed. Leaders are installed for life (and beyond, with the advent of presidential succession in Syria). And in Saudi Arabia and the other oil-rich countries, tens of billions of dollars are the private property of small tribes and royal families, and their retainers. In addition to the huge price paid by the citizens of these countries, this situation feeds the frustration that turns into terrorism and violence.

In this environment, the removal of Saddam Hussein and a regime change in Iraq could trigger a domino effect throughout the Arab world, from North Africa to the Gulf. While there are different predictions regarding the day after the war, the replacement of the current regime with a more open and responsible government, as in the case of Afghanistan, is still the most likely outcome.

Once the flood-gates open, the climate of fear in Iraq is lifted and the population begins to celebrate its restored freedom, the citizens in neighbouring countries around the Middle East will be infected. A dramatic leadership change in Baghdad will launch a chain of similar processes in the region.

After Iraq, the Palestinian Authority might well be the next in line. The regime of Yasser Arafat and the PLO has controlled Palestinian life for decades, with no lasting accomplishments. The hope created with the 1993 Oslo agreements has been destroyed by terrorism and violence, Israeli troops have returned to the cities, and the creation of a Palestinian state seems as far off as ever.

Instead of the promised economic development, a corrupt and incompetent leadership has gone in the opposite direction. Within Palestinian society, this criticism is growing, coinciding with the demand for regime change in U.S. President George W. Bush's speech on Middle East peace last June. Thus, the forces unleashed by the replacement of Saddam Hussein could provide the catalyst for ushering in a new more open and democratic Palestinian society ready to co-operate with Israel in a two-state framework.

The same factors are necessary for the societal transformation that will lead to peace and the replacement of rejectionism with acceptance of the legitimacy of Israel as a Jewish state. While there are no guarantees, there is at least the hope that in a more open political atmosphere, the blind hatred and incitement will be replaced by mutual acceptance and a stable peace. A leadership that is accountable to its citizens would also restore the credibility of Palestinian pledges with respect to preventing terrorism and in other critical areas.

These changes will not take place in a vacuum, and from Baghdad and Ramallah, similar processes will spread to other countries, including Syria and Saudi Arabia. While the first priorities will be towards internal political and economic change, this foundation can open the path to real peace based on popular support throughout the region. Four decades after Asia started down the road to freedom and economic growth, the Arab Middle East may finally have a chance to follow a similar path.

The Kirshner File

Saddam biography takes measure of the man

Stripped to its barest essentials, the story of Saddam Hussein is the saga of a poor, unlettered boy from an impoverished village on a bend of the Tigris River who rose to great heights as he modernized Iraq and then squandered his capital by invading Iran and Kuwait, transforming Iraq into a vile dictatorship and defying the United Nations over his possession of proscribed weapons of mass destruction.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

In the coming days or weeks, should the United States and its allies choose to invade Iraq, the final chapter of Saddam's tumultuous and destructive career will be written on the white hot crucible of war.

But for now, before hostilities break out, it may be useful to go back to basics and take the measure of the man who brought misfortune upon himself and his country.

There is no better place to begin than Con Coughlin's biography, Saddam: King of Terror (HarperCollins). It is neither the first nor last account of the most brutal Arab leader of modern times. But in light of the current Iraqi crisis, it is a timely book that offers keen insights into his mentality.

Saddam was born in Al-Ouja, eight kilometres south of Tikrit, on April 28, 1937. Al-Ouja, then a collection of mud huts and houses without running water or electricity, is of no historic importance. But Tikrit, the birthplace of Saladin, the legendary Muslim commander who defeated the Crusaders in Palestine, is a redoubt of Arab pride.

Saddam's humble origins shaped him, becoming the driving force of his ambition, while his deep sense of insecurity – his father, Hussein al-Majid, a landless peasant, abandoned his mother, Subha Tulfah – left him pathologically incapable of trusting anyone.

For all intents and purposes, Saddam, a fatherless child, turned for guidance to his uncle, Khairallah Tulfah. He was a fervent Arab nationalist and army officer who participated in the failed 1941 Rashid Ali revolt against the British and a pamphleteer who wrote a racist screed entitled Three Whom God Should Not Have Created: Persians, Jews and Flies. Saddam's uncle also introduced him to Ahmad Hassan al-Bakr, an army officer and future Iraqi president who played a central role in Saddam's rise to power. Years later, by way of appreciation, Saddam appointed Tulfah mayor of Baghdad.

At the age of 20, Saddam, who had a reputation for ruthlessness and brutality, joined the Ba'ath party. Bakr took him under his wing, sensing he could be useful. And so he was. In 1959, a year after the monarchy was overthrown by Gen. Abdul Karim Qassem, Saddam and a few young men of his ilk were assigned the task of assassinating the new Iraqi president. The attack, the subject of a 1980s hagiographic film produced by the ministry of propaganda, was unsuccessful. Qassem was wounded, and Saddam fled into exile, first to Damascus and then to Cairo.

In 1963, the Ba'ath deposed Qassem and executed him by firing squad. Saddam was given a lowly job at the Central Farmer's Office, but soon he was put in charge of interrogating party opponents and building up Iraq's internal security structure, a body that would be, Coughlin reminds us, one of his main pathways to power.

A shy, socially awkward person prone to emotional displays, Saddam consolidated his position in the aftermath of the 1968 coup, which installed Bakr as president. As his deputy, Saddam purged the military of non-Ba'athists, established a Kafkaesque network to monitor the activities of government employees, and presided over the public executions of 14 alleged spies, nine of whom were Iraqi Jews.

Saddam was also responsible for establishing an arms alliance with the Soviet Union and for nationalizing Iraq's oil industry. With revenues from nationalization, Iraq was able to modernize and rearm itself.

With Saddam in tow, Bakr set out to create a more egalitarian society, the hallmarks of which were government ownership of national resources, agrarian and educational reform and equal opportunities for women. Military spending jumped as Iraq bought advanced weapons from the Soviet Union and France.

Regarding himself as the natural heir to Egypt's Gamal Abdel Nasser, who died in 1970, and comparing himself to a Babylonian king who had conquered Jerusalem in 587 B.C.E., Saddam firmly believed that it was Iraq's destiny to be a pre-eminent force in Middle East politics. But to attain prominence, Iraq had to further develop its military capabilities. It did so by trying to acquire a formidable arsenal of non-conventional nuclear, biological and chemical weapons that could give Saddam "strategic reach."

Committed to Israel's destruction, Saddam concluded that "the liberation of Palestine" would remain a pipe dream until Iraq was scientifically, economically and militarily strong. In pursuit of this objective, Iraq purchased a nuclear reactor from France. The chief salesman was Jacques Chirac, then France's prime minister and now its president. Rightly suspicious of Iraq's intentions, Israel bombed the reactor in June 1981. Unbowed, Saddam resurrected the nuclear program and redoubled his efforts to develop chemical and biological weapons.

Angered over former Egyptian president Anwar Sadat's incremental dialogue with Israel after the 1973 Yom Kippur War, Iraq sought to isolate Egypt and to portray itself as a truly radical regime. Saddam courted the infamous Abu Nidal – whose attempted assassination of the Israeli ambassador to Britain, Shlomo Argov, was the pretext for Israel's invasion of Lebanon in 1982 – and Wadi Haddad, one of the founders of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. As a result, the United States placed Iraq on a list of states accused of sponsoring terrorism.

Saddam Hussein in 1960

Iraq attempted to rally the Arab world against Egypt in the wake of the 1978 Camp David accords, which paved the way for Israel's peace treaty with Egypt.

Coughlin claims, not without reason, that the challenge posed by Camp David and the emergence of an Islamic fundamentalist government in Iran persuaded Saddam that the ailing Bakr could no longer provide the aggressive leadership Iraq now required. In a series of machinations, Saddam eased out Bakr, replacing him as president.

When Saddam assumed Bakr's mantle in 1979, Iraq was a relatively wealthy country and the Arab world's first social welfare state. Unlike his predecessor, Saddam had no intention of sharing power. In a purge which Coughlin describes in chilling fashion, Saddam handily got rid of his rivals and proceeded to create a one-party state. His role model was none other than Josef Stalin. And like Stalin, Saddam cultivated a cult of personality.

Iraq's 1980 invasion of Iran, a cardinal error, stemmed from Saddam's misguided belief that he could negotiate a better deal over the Shatt al-Arab waterway, Baghdad's gateway to the Persian Gulf. Iraq had signed the agreement, which gave Iran control of the waterway, from a position of weakness in 1975. In exchange for ceding the Shatt al-Arab to Tehran, Saddam hoped Iran would withdraw its support of Iraq's rebellious Kurds. In addition, he sought to acquire Iran's oil-rich Khuzistan area and foment the collapse of its clerical regime. Saddam calculated that he could achieve his objectives within a matter of weeks, but he was dead wrong. The war dragged on for almost eight years, draining both countries. When Saddam's minister of health suggested he should resign so that a ceasefire could be worked out, Saddam took him aside and shot him.

Regarding Iraq as a counterweight to Iran, the United States supplied valuable military intelligence to Baghdad. During this period, Donald Rumsfeld – then-U.S. president Ronald Reagan's personal representative and now U.S. President George W. Bush's secretary of defence – met with Saddam. Washington was willing to overlook Saddam's miserable human rights record, and it was not particularly outraged by Iraq's use of poison gas against Iranian troops and the Kurds.

The war wrecked Iraq's economy. Iraq was saddled with $80 billion (US) in debts and reconstruction costs of $230 billion (US).

Instead of keeping his nose to the grindstone, Saddam lashed out at Kuwait, which Iraq regards as its 19th province. When Saddam occupied Kuwait in August 1990, he was under the impression that he had received a "green light" from April Glaspie, the U.S. ambassador in Baghdad, and that Washington would not lift a finger to protect Kuwait. Once again, he had miscalculated. And his efforts to suck Israel into the Gulf War by firing Scud missiles at its cities also proved useless, though somewhat costly to Israelis.

With Iraq having been soundly trounced in the "mother-of-all-battles," Saddam crushed U.S.-instigated Shi'ite and Kurdish revolts in southern and northern Iraq. Then, with United Nations inspectors scouring the country for prohibited weapons, he dodged and weaved.

To this day, he prevaricates. But now he awaits his terrible moment of truth.

Purim

Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto בתי חלמוד התורה המאוחדים בטורונטו

Of all the holidays celebrated at school, Purim is perhaps the most joyous. Costumes, carnivals and hamantaschen are everywhere. Bet Hayeled children make costumes, learn songs, and present a Purim play for parents and grandparents. Elementary and Middle School children learn about Purim in greater depth, and plan the school-wide carnival. The Megilla is read, and each child gives Mishloach Manot (food) and Matanot La'evyonim (charity). "Our children fulfill all the mitzvot of the day, and learn the Purim message of Jewish survival while having fun," says Educational Director Rabbi Abraham Soffer. "It's one of the best days of the year."

Toronto man named head of El Al in Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Stanley Morais is one of those white-collar management types who doesn't mind getting his hands a little dirty.

His background is in sales and marketing but he realizes that when the situation demands it, "I shlep bags when they need me to shlep bags."

At El Al, where he's worked for the last 4½ years, sometimes you have to go the extra mile to get the job done, he says.

Though he's a hands-on kind of manager, chances are he'll be spending most of his time behind the desk in the corner office he now occupies.

On March 1, Morais was named general manager of the Canadian office of El Al Israel Airlines, taking over from Rami Fischer, who was promoted to New York to head up El Al's cargo operation in North and South America.

At 34, soon to be 35, Morais is one of the youngest El Al managers anywhere, but his appointment typifies a trend that is seeing the Israeli national air carrier look to local talent to run its operations around the world.

Morais takes the mantle of El Al's Canadian operation at a time when airlines the world over are experiencing existential crises, with many – including El Al's Canadian competitor, Air Canada – in financial difficulty.

It's a situation Morais is all too familiar with, having lived through El Al's own painful restructuring over the last few years. But, Morais believes, much of what needed to be done has been done and the future has potential, offering him the opportunity to build on the changes implemented by his predecessors, Moshe Shamai and Fischer.

Morais believes there is room to grow the Toronto-Los Angeles route, to develop a broader customer base among non-Jewish pilgrims to Israel and to entice back some in the Jewish community who last flew El Al when surly stewardesses, overcrowded cabins and the stink of cigarette smoke were all too common.

Buttressing the carrier's Canadian base is a far cry from the day a few years ago when El Al closed several unprofitable routes and rumours abounded that Toronto-Tel Aviv might be next.

Morais, who was then working as sales and marketing manager, recalls that it took some convincing and changes to the carrier's profile to make sure it didn't suffer the fate of the Viennese office, which did close.

El Al cleaned up its act, it introduced newer, more comfortable planes, it made its flights non-smoking, and it began the process of developing a corporate culture that put customer service first, he said.

At the same time, "El Al had to make some difficult decisions," including the one to close its Montreal office and to reroute its Canadian departures instead through Toronto.

El Al has taken several steps to win back passengers, including introduction of the ultra-modern Boeing 777, a new platinum business class designation, a code-sharing agreement with Delta that allows both airlines to book their passengers on the other's flights, and introduction of the competitively priced Toronto-Los Angeles route. And of course, El Al maintained the rigorous security standards that have made it the model in the industry.

Stanley Morais [Paul Lungen photo]

At the same time as El Al was competing for passenger traffic, Fischer was exposing Morais to the financial and strategic aspects of the airline business. Morais believes his selection to head up the airline's Canadian office is a clear signal that El Al has confidence in the route and in its growth potential.

"I'm embedded in this community," Morais said, "from synagogue life, to different organizations. I know what's going on with regards to this community."

A native of Toronto, Morais attended Associated Hebrew School and later the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

He participated in United Synagogue Youth as an adviser and he spent one year at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem, studying political science.

Back in Toronto, Morais studied the relationship between political culture and the media, and his first job out of university was working in public relations for the Israel Government Tourism Office. Afterwards he moved to an advertising firm for one year and later was recruited by El Al.

Morais said the airline has listened to its customers, improved its planes, its scheduling, its entire attitude.

Now, he said, he'd like to see the Jewish community reciprocate, not only because to do so would help the 5,000 El Al employees whose livelihoods have been affected by the intifadah, but because El Al simply offers the best service to the Jewish state.

BB finds 'alarming' surge in anti-Semitic incidents

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Canada surged at an "alarming" rate in 2002 and included "a disquieting trend to violence," said Rochelle Wilner, national president of B'nai Brith Canada.

"We want to know why the anti-racist community in Canada remains so silent about anti-Semitism," she said.

B'nai Brith's 2002 Audit of Antisemitic Incidents, which was released last week, found that anti-Semitic activity in Canada is on the rise, with a 61 per cent increase nation-wide compared to 2001.

'Disquieting trend to violence'

"In total, 459 incidents were reported, which is the highest number in the 20-year history of the audit. In the past five years alone, the number of incidents has more than doubled," the report stated.

Of the entire range of incidents, 282 (61 per cent) were classified as harassment, 148 (32 per cent) were categorized as vandalism and 29 (6 per cent) were described as violence.

The year-end data confirm the findings reported in an interim report released in mid-year, shortly after the murder in Toronto of David Rosenzweig outside a kosher restaurant.

B'nai Brith noted that prior to the 2002 audit, incidents of violence were included under the harassment category, but "as physical assault became more common following 9/11... B'nai Brith added the third category of violence in order to be able to track the increasing use of violence in the incidents reported in 2002."

The audit notes that advances in inter-ethnic understanding coincided with a drop in incidents as the 9/11 terror attacks receded into the past.

But because incidents involving Jews increased while the rest of the community enjoyed a decline, "the findings of the 2002 audit are alarming. In addition to the marked rise in incidents, the increasing use of the imagery and motifs of violence has been reflected in a disquieting trend towards physical assault. This trend is illustrated in the 29 cases of outright violence recorded in the audit, one of which involved the murder of a visibly Orthodox man [Rosenzweig]," the audit stated.

The Toronto Police Service, in its annual report of hate-motivated crime that was released a few weeks ago, did not include the Rosenzweig murder in its final tally, saying it found no evidence indicating the murder was motivated by hate.

Among the examples of violence cited in the audit was an incident in Montreal last April when "15 participants in a soccer game were overheard shouting 'death to Jews' in Arabic and French throughout the match. When the game ended, several Arab-speaking youths jumped the fence and assaulted a group of Jewish students, threatening them with knives."

In Windsor last September, "Jewish teens wearing skullcaps were attacked on the street by a group of men," while in Quebec City in May, "a pipe bomb was thrown at the city's only synagogue."

In Mississauga that same month, "a female high school student had to be escorted to and from classes after being harassed in the schoolyard by Arab-speaking students and subjected to anti-Semitic remarks and threats of violence."

In two highly publicized events, "rabbis and other visible Jews were assaulted at the Concordia [University] campus [in Montreal] as part of a riot" before a planned lecture by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, while in Toronto, a Jewish physician was called a "Jewish murderer," was pushed to the ground and his collarbone broken during a demonstration by pro-Palestinian protesters.

The audit also recounted the David Ahenakew affair, in which the Saskatchewan aboriginal leader unleashed an anti-Semitic diatribe at a meeting of native leaders. As well, it noted that at campuses across Canada, anti-Israel advocacy has often "taken the flavour of anti-Semitism while ostensibly maintaining a veneer of political correctness."

The audit points out that 33 per cent of the 459 incidents occurred in April and May. That period coincided with Israel's anti-terror incursion into the West Bank, which followed the Passover seder suicide bombing at a Netanya hotel that killed 29 people.

"The wild and unfounded massacre charges that accompanied Israel's action against the infrastructure of terror in the West Bank, and the wide media coverage that ensued until these allegations were disproved, led to a climate that proved a fertile ground for anti-Semitic outbursts.

"The overwhelming condemnation of Israel appeared to be taken as validation of attacks against individual Jews and Jewish organizations in this country and was used as an opportunity to express apparently latent antagonism and bias," the audit concludes.

Academic explores child survivors' experiences

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

Abuse, loneliness, alienation and guilt often defined the formative years of child survivors of the Holocaust, leaving many of them traumatized and unable to discuss pivotal moments from their past, a Hebrew University academic says.

Europe had approximately 9.4 million Jews in 1939. By the time World War II was over, six million Jews had been killed, 1½ million of whom were children. Only 10 per cent of European Jewish children survived.

Sharon Kangisser-Cohen

In a lecture last week sponsored by the March of the Living titled "The Holocaust Through A Child's Eye," Sharon Kangisser-Cohen described some of the horrific experiences endured by children, as well as their efforts to deal with the guilt of survival when so many had died.

The Hebrew University doctoral candidate told a gathering at Congregation Habonim that, in most cases, children were flexible and able to adapt to new situations far better than their parents. However, their age and stage of development affected their ability to cope emotionally during the war and influenced their recovery afterward.

Kangisser-Cohen spoke of Jewish children who attempted to join Nazi groups at the beginning of the war in order gain acceptance from German friends who ostracized them.

Others turned the events they were experiencing into adventures and games.

"One way to master their experiences and transcend the situation was to imagine they were characters in a play or a game," she said.

Recovery depended a great deal on family situations and the presence of a nurturing adult, Kangisser-Cohen said. Children felt secure as long as a parent was with them and still in control. However, in those cases when caregivers were taken away or began to suffer from mental health disorders, such as depression, the emotional health of the child was more directly affected.

After the war, Kangisser-Cohen said, child survivors described having to cope with feelings of rejection by other survivors, as well as by the Jewish world around them.

They were forced into silence because "it was too difficult for adults to listen to the children. They felt guilty for not having been able to protect them."

Today, society is much more willing to hear about the Holocaust, and survivors feel the need to communicate their past, especially to their grandchildren, Kangisser-Cohen said.

However, it is unclear whether talking about past traumatic experiences always helps survivors.

"Remembering can sometimes reinforce the pain because they are forced to relive their experiences," she said.

Repressed Holocaust memories an ongoing problem

In a book titled Child Survivors of the Holocaust, published by Brunner-Routledge, psychotherapist Paul Valent explores various issues related to childhood trauma, including the roots of memory and the effects of trauma on survivors and their children.

Through 10 personal stories, Valent depicts some of the atrocities experienced by Jewish children during the war. Each narrative is followed by his analysis as a psychiatrist about the long-term effects of rejection, abandonment, humiliation, abuse and helplessness. Many child survivors repressed their memories because they couldn't make sense of them.

"Child survivors were caught in the dilemma that to be alive they had to remember, but to remember meant pain for themselves and others. The struggle continues and therefore not all emotions and meanings have been unblocked," he writes.

Valent describes how, as adults, survivors often find it difficult to be involved in the everyday needs of their children, focusing instead on expressing their love through protection and preservation.

"They loved passionately where survival was concerned, but the important little empathies and sympathies, the trivial everyday joys and pleasures of life, often passed them by."

Many were also adept at leading double lives and concealing their emotions – presenting themselves as the "life of the party," while inside they were tormented. "Without such skills they would not have survived," Valent writes.

For most child survivors "there were no happy endings," as many of them had to deal with loneliness or broken parents who needed care, he adds.

Many now experience sleeplessness and nighttime Holocaust terrors. Most never get over "a sense of being different, not belonging, of not being truly accepted."

What's going to happen to you if you don't lose weight?

(Here's how hypnosis may solve all of your weight loss problems)

According to Health Canada, approximately 300,000 people die each year due to health related problems caused by obesity. Overweight and obesity are associated with heart disease, certain types of cancer, type 2 diabetes, stroke, arthritis, breathing problems, and psychological disorders, such as depression. If your doctor has told you to lose weight, it is because your weight may be putting you at risk for serious health issues.

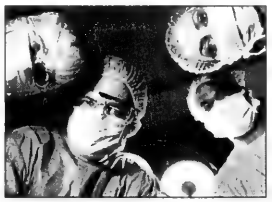
What's Wrong With Dieting? The inherent problem with dieting is the extreme focus on the foods that you are eating rather than on helping you change the way you think about food. Eating habits are deeply ingrained in our subconscious mind. Without changing these habits, dieters become frustrated and soon give up. Many health professionals are now recommending a revolutionary new non-diet approach to losing weight: hypnosis.

Finding the Key to Change. The subconscious mind often stores negative thoughts or behaviours that can trigger destructive habits. For overweight people, an inability to change these habits can result in a lifelong struggle with weight. The most effective way to overcome this obstacle is to reprogram the subconscious mind through hypnosis.

"In a relaxed state like hypnosis, it's easier to incorporate new habits," explains Dr. Patrick Porter, Clinical Director and Founder of Positive Changes Hypnosis.

"We help clients think and eat like a slim person by redirecting their subconscious mind," says Porter. "You lose weight and keep it off long-term because you change your whole relationship with food. You never have to think about dieting, because your weight is no longer an issue."



Research Proves Hypnosis Works. As evidenced by recent studies published in medical journals, hypnosis has been shown to be a successful tool for weight loss. For example:

Seventeen Times More Effective. The Journal of Consulting and Clinical Psychology reported on a study of 60 women who were at least 20% overweight. The women who participated in hypnosis lost an average of 17 pounds while the control group lost only a half-pound on average.

Are You Finally Ready to Lose Weight For Good? If your doctor has told you to lose weight, you don't have a moment to lose. At Positive Changes Hypnosis Centres you are invited to attend a free weight loss consultation and demonstration. You will learn all about hypnosis and how it can benefit you. You owe it to yourself and your loved ones to find out.

In a few short months you could be strolling back into your doctor's office with a smile. Your physician will commend you for your progress and will know that you have already reduced your risk for heart disease, diabetes, stroke and more. Above all, you'll feel terrific in your healthy new body.

There's no time like the present to take that first step towards a new you. Call Positive Changes today to arrange your free weight loss consultation.

Hebrew U prof examines kingdom of the Khazars

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For four centuries beginning towards the end of the first millennium, a powerful and warlike Turkic tribe dominated a strategic area between the Muslim Middle East and Christian Europe.

From the Black Sea to the Caspian Sea, from the Caucasus to the Volga River, the Khazar Kingdom dominated the region and fended off Muslim attempts at northern expansion, in effect, protecting the southeastern flank of European Christendom.

Early in their ascent – historians place the date at 740 – the Khazar king Bulan along with his royal court converted to Judaism. When the kingdom disintegrated following conflict with their expansionist Russian neighbours to the north, the Khazars' imprint on history slowly disappeared, though what happened to the people remains a mystery.

Scholars have long been intrigued by the Khazar story but no one has been able to offer a definitive account of their fate. Last week, an expert on the history and culture of Russian Jews summarized current thinking about the once powerful Jewish kingdom of the Khazars.

Prof. Wolf Moskovich, head of the department of Russian and Slavic studies at Hebrew University in Jerusalem, said there currently exists "a very small pool of existing sources" on the Khazars.

Speaking at the 2003 Shoshana Shier Distinguished Visiting Professor lecture in Jewish studies at the University of Toronto, Moskovich said "the Khazars vanished and nobody knows where they are."

He suggested that while the Khazars were reportedly forced to convert to Islam as the price they paid for last ditch military aid, many might have lived on as Karaites, Krimchuck Jews (in Crimea) or as the Mountain Jews of the Caucasus.

Legend has even conflated the Khazars with the 10 lost tribes of Israel, who are said to be exiled on the far side of the Sambatyon River, which has been linked with the city of Kiev, an area inhabited by Khazars, he said.

One of the most popular beliefs suggests much of Eastern European Jewry can trace its origins back to the Khazars, and not to eastern migration of Jews from central Europe.

The Thirteenth Tribe, a book written in 1976 by novelist Arthur Koestler, made just that suggestion of Khazar origins, but his thesis was motivated by ideology, not history, Moskovich said.

While Koestler was trying to de-link European Jews from their Israelite heritage to make them better fit into European society, Israel's Arab foes and anti-Semites were making the same argument in a bid to deligitimize the Jewish state, the professor added.

Although the documentary history of the Khazars is sketchy, there are early sources that refer to the Khazar empire, he continued. Writing in the 11th century, Yehuda Halevi referred to the Khazar kingdom while the Cairo Geniza contained several contemporaneous letters that also refer to the Khazars. Arab travellers also recorded references to the Khazars as a Jewish kingdom.

Various traces of the Khazar language have been incorporated as Yiddish, Moskovich said. The word "davening," or praying, for one, is of Persian origin as is the word "lockshin" (noodles), suggesting they entered the Yiddish language through an eastern European source, likely the Khazars.

The Karaites, an 8th-century offshoot of Judaism which rejects rabbinic authority and which focuses instead only on the Bible, displayed aspects of the Khazar lifestyle, from their nomadic ways, their love of the horse and their Turkic-origin language.

Moskovich concluded that during its heyday, the Khazar ruling class was Jewish and that Jews from Persia and Mesopotamia found refuge under their domain. Ultimately, he said, their fate is unknown and the question as to the fate of the Khazars remains open.

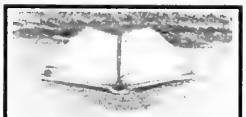
Lessons of freedom from Purim

By RABBI CHANANYA BERZON



Rabbinic Reflections

We empathize with nations whose citizens strive for liberty and freedom, even at the price of endangering their lives. Having to choose between living without liberty or dying is a serious conflict. Often, people would prefer to fight for their independence and perhaps sacrifice their life for the cause of family and national security.

The fathers of Zionism struggled for a Jewish homeland, a fortress for religious and national freedom, free of persecution, where they would be able to make their own decisions and direct their destiny. They knew, obviously, that much blood would be spilled on the battlefield. There was no viable choice. Two thousand years of religious persecution culminating in the Holocaust had engraved on their hearts the dictum, "Never again."

"We will no longer allow our lives to be controlled by others. We will dictate our own mode of behaviour, led by our government in our country," they said.

An event in the Book of Esther can add insight and depth to the issue of freedom. Haman convinced Achashverosh to permit him to slaughter all the Jews. At a party Queen Esther organized for the king and Haman, she addressed them, saying, "I and my people are to be slain. If we had been sold for slaves, I would have held my peace" (Esther 7:3, 4).

Was Esther serious when she said that if her people were sold into slavery she would have remained silent? Surely, Esther would have protested and begged the king to rescind a decree of enslavement. Slavery entitles the master to total domination over the slave. (See Samuel 1:8, 16 and Maimonides in Mishnah Torah Kings 4: 1, 2.)

Esther blurted out something that she didn't think through. Her Galut mentality led her to believe that there is no option other than to trust a gentile government and hopefully be treated with religious, social, educational and economical equality.

Is our attitude today any better? Are we not endangering our liberties for the sake of being part and parcel of the culture that surrounds us? How often are our "Jewish rights" impinged upon when we hear anti-Semitic smirks and read articles and books that contain messages of hate, and realize we have no way of protesting against these insults and slanders, even though we live – or maybe because we live – in a true democracy? Why do we grit our teeth and suffer in silence when we see anti-Semitic and anti-Israel lies regurgitated in the media?

Esther was not an astute politician. She did not have any insight into the political dynamic. Why, then, was this miraculous story, the Book of Esther, named after her? She is depicted as a young maiden, kidnapped into the bedchambers of the king and isolated from the complexities and intricacies of government. Would not the Book of Mordechai be a more fitting name? Mordechai was a respected member of the Sanhedrin, a prophet who uncovered the plot of Haman and urged Esther to take action.

But one of the most fundamental themes of the Purim story – Esther's willingness to place her life in jeopardy – is the turning point in the miraculous tale. She was willing to take both Achashverosh and Haman to task. She realized that she was replaceable and that she might find herself swinging from a tree instead of Haman. She discovered that destiny had placed her in a pivotal position. She therefore became the heroine of the Purim saga.

Jews in Israel and throughout the world must never forget the importance of liberty and freedom. With the help of HaShem, since our mission is worthy and holy, we will succeed.

Megillat Esther's grim lesson

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Let's call him Paul. He is a fan of the Doors and of J.R.R. Tolkien. Fan may be too mild a word. Fan suggests gentle breezes – "a handheld device for creating a cooling draught" says the Dictionary of Word Origins – as opposed to the raging torrent of thought and energy that Paul brings to his imagination.

JEWISH EDUCATION The Next Generation

Everyday life is not his reality of choice. In one of the delicious paradoxes of education, however, his average is in the 90s, as his predilection for fantasy in no way thwarts his sucking in material like another one of his heroes, Commander Data of Star Trek fame. After all, we want to read Lord of the Rings in our Harvard dorm room, not the unemployment office.

Paul is my student. He and I are seated together one lunchtime and we are talking about politics, and about the impending American attack on Iraq.

"Bush is immoral," he tells me. "You cannot kill innocent people and rationalize it in the name of some larger goal. The ends do not justify the means." This conversation takes place in November 1990. Although not precisely a disciple of Gandhi, Paul is adamant that a moral war is an oxymoron and that only a clear case of self-defence should be grounds for a response.

I find Paul's position naive and dangerous, but he remains defiant in his view.

Years later, I am pondering the ending of Megillat Esther and thinking about its disturbing implications. Haman and his children have already been executed. Despite this seeming victory, the Jews "gathered together and stood for their lives, and had rest from their enemies, and killed 75,000 of those that hated them" (Esther, 9:15).

Was such a response tragically disproportionate? Is this another example of a biblical text that we celebrate without fully appreciating its brutal message?

Indeed this part of the story is often underplayed or even passed over in Jewish education. As Yoram Hazoni points out in The Dawn, "Jews today, as well as others who come to read Esther... have no life experiences which suggest to them first-hand a need for force, violence and war, and their education, generally at the hands of society's most genial men, stresses and strains to inculcate the virtues of 'outgrowing' force."

And so for many people, a quaint story turns horrifying in the wake of the needless rampage of the story's completion.

Yet the destruction of the 75,000 isn't just a cynical Machiavellian necessity. It is actually one of the book's moral themes.

Politics is precisely about the need to apply power in response to how it is employed by others, as Hazony adds: "Without decisive action against his enemy, Mordechai would have guaranteed a reputation of hesitance and mildness – a reputation which would have breathed new life into the anti-Semitism of the empire."

These are surely not happy conclusions, but such a grim conclusion is no less true because it is difficult to swallow.

As history now repeats itself in the spring of 2003, the teachings of Esther remind us that things which are "underground" or far from plain sight have surely not disappeared and will surface again, be they weapons held by monstrous and genocidal tyrants or, lehavdil, the presence of God.

Purim food on the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Last week we looked at Purim traditions from around the world. Today, Purim food with a twist, courtesy of the largest Jewish cookbook in the world, the World Wide Web. We'll look at some traditional recipes and then focus on the foods from the corner of the world that gave us the story of Purim.

One of the most popular traditions of the holiday is mishloach manot, sending a minimum of two items of food to one person. [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/purim/index.htm] These days, that usually means a basket of store-bought, sugar-laden candies. But there are some creative alternatives. Beit HaChatulim is a Jewish vegetarian homeschool in Sharon, Mass. Their site includes a healthy serving of philosophy and recipes. [http://www.geocities.com/Heartland/Hills/1259/mishloach.htm] They fill their mishloach manot baskets with hamantaschen, marshmallow brownies, caramel popcorn, apple bread and something called ding-bats (dates, pecans and crisp rice cereal). Recipes for these goodies are at their site.

If you want to give in to your sweet tooth, try your hand at Persian Rice Cookies, Honey-Dipped Poppy Seed Cookies, [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=PURIM] or a couple dozen variations of hamantaschen. [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/hamindex.htm] You'll find traditional recipes using prune and poppy seed, and others that would have puzzled the people of Shushan, like cream cheese and chocolate peanut butter. And if you're really daring, there are beef and onion-filled hamantaschen. [http://dinnercoop.cs.cmu.edu/dinnercoop/Recipes/jody/FlayshigeHamantashen.html]

After that you may need a drink. There is the well-known – and curious – custom of becoming so drunk that you don't know the difference between Mordechai and Haman. Eli Birnbaum points out that "there are no absolutes in this world other than God. Everything can be used for good and evil. So too we celebrate our salvation from Haman by showing that even intoxication can be used to elevate one's soul." Birnbaum likes to elevate his soul with his homemade Israeli Orange Brandy that he shares with us. [http://www.wzo.org.il/encountr/drink.htm]

I was surprised to learn that there is a variation of challah just for this holiday. A Purim challah is prepared in the shape of a hamantasch with apricot or strawberry preserves spooned into the centre. [http://www.solihullshul.org/festivals/Purim/purim2001c.htm] Or try some edible challah baskets. [http://ourworld.compuserve.com/homepages/Susieq/basket1.htm]

Everybody knows that hamantaschen and (moderate) drinking are age-old Purim traditions. But how about enjoying turkey, kreplach and fish cooked in vinegar, raisins and spices? You'll find explanations for these foods at the Jewish Agency Web site along with the reason we use poppy seeds in our hamantaschen. Tradition has it that in order to ensure that she not eat non-kosher foods, Esther ate only seeds in the king's palace. Thanks to Esther's piety, we get tasty filling for our Purim treats. [http://www.jajz-ed.org.il/festivls/PURIM/pugnen05.html]

Purim is unique among all the holidays in the calendar in that we enjoy the festive meal as the day is winding down. [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/purim/seuda.htm] If you'd like to skip the boiled chicken and go for something authentic, why not try a Persian menu at your feast. Nesta Ramazani's Chicken in Pomegranate Sauce calls for pomegranate syrup, walnuts, saffron, cinnamon, nutmeg and pepper. Or you can try Queen Esther's Chicken. [http://makeashorterlink.com/?C31E136A3]

How about Crusty Spicy Rice with Tangy Tangerine Chicken topped off by Chickpea-filled Pastry? The Jewish-food Purim Archives recommend Persian Lamb and Apricot Pilaf. [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/purindex.htm]

And now for dessert. Linda Haim Meadows is a Jewish Iraqi artist living in Los Angeles who suggests a Middle East version of the traditional hamantaschen. Her Ba'ba Beh Tamur are Iraqi filled pastries with a yeast dough. [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/recipes/Purim_Iraqi_Filled_Pastries.htm] Try them out with almond, date, or if you're having a dairy meal, a Jarlsberg and Muenster cheese filling.

Or just bite into some Persian chalvah and worry about those calories tomorrow. [http://food.epicurious.com/run/recipe/view?id=40004]

Have a very filling and fulfilling holiday!

Book focuses on decisions of war

The Conquerors: Roosevelt, Truman and the Destruction of Hitler's Germany 1941-1945*, by Michael Beschloss, Simon & Schuster, $41.95

Books
Bernard Baskin

What should be done with a defeated Nazi Germany? This is the fateful question that confronted U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt and other high American military and diplomatic figures about 60 years ago.

There were two broad general ideas proposed. Secretary of the Treasury Henry Morgenthau Jr., fearful of a rearmed Germany that would again endanger the world, suggested that the country be broken up into several small non-industrial states. Initially, this proposal was approved by Roosevelt.

The other more conventional proposal, strongly advocated by British prime minister Winston Churchill, was to quickly restore Germany as a major force against the territorial appetite of an aggressive Soviet Union.

Morgenthau was the only Jew in Roosevelt's cabinet and among his closest friends. He was a well-meaning, largely assimilated, Jewish patrician. In the summer of 1942, Rabbi Stephen Wise brought Morgenthau unmistakeable evidence of the Nazi campaign of annihilation. Appalled beyond words, Morgenthau appealed to Roosevelt and other government officials to counter Hitler's evil program, but he met with little success.

The author writes that by tacitly suggesting that the United States did not know about the genocide or care enough to issue a specific protest, Roosevelt's silence may have emboldened Nazis to pursue the Jews of Europe with greater vigour, presuming that they would have to pay no special postwar penalty for their offence in case the Allies won.

How can we understand or condone Roosevelt's terrible silence? It seems a strange lapse in the record of a president who normally spoke to Americans on grave world issues with courage, candour and foresight. This lapse is underscored by Roosevelt's lateness in pushing his officials to save Jewish refugees and his reluctance to seriously consider whether bombing Auschwitz might save some of Hitler's intended victims.

Roosevelt's most stalwart defenders insist that the best way to save Jews was to win the European war as quickly as possible, and that diverting bombers and crews from the bombing of German industry and other strategic targets might have postponed VE-Day.

As a result of Morgenthau's direct appeal to the president, the War Refugee Board was created in January 1944, which led to the saving of thousands of Jewish lives.

Drawing on newly released documents from the post-Soviet Union, the FBI and private archives, as well as meticulous diaries and notes by high American officials, Beschloss, an authority on American presidential history, portrays an increasingly incapacitated FDR coping with the most momentous decisions of the war. He allows us to eavesdrop on Roosevelt in his bedroom, on the telephone and in private meetings with Churchill and Josef Stalin.

The Conquerors sheds light on how the United States and Great Britain were prepared to deal with a defeated Germany and how U.S. president Harry Truman managed to pick up the pieces and push Stalin and Churchill to accede to an agreement that would let the Anglo-Americans block Soviet threats against western Europe and ensure that the world would not have to fear another Hitler.

This revealing book, written for the general reader, is both engrossing and of enduring historical interest.

Making beautiful music together

A partnership between the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre's (BJCC) Koffler Centre of the Arts and The Royal Conservatory of Music (RCM) Community School has hit all the right notes during its first year.

The RCM Community School introduced its programming at the BJCC last Fall, and has since been bringing its 100 years of experience in music education to young members of Toronto's Jewish community.

"We've always looked forward to collaborating with new organizations, and what could be better than The Royal Conservatory," says Adrienne Cohen, Director, Koffler School of Music, and a former student at the Conservatory. "We are so pleased and so proud of this new partnership," says Cohen. "It is thrilling for us at the Koffler School to now have the additional resources they bring."

The beginning of this musical partnership began when Cohen contacted the Conservatory's Assistant Dean, Stephen Green, who came to the Koffler Centre to see what it had to offer.

"The facilities at the Koffler Centre show great potential for growth,"says Green. "To be honest, it is always easier to move into an empty building, but this way, it's like we've joined a big, wonderful family."

According to Green, the uniqueness of this partnership also allows the RCM Community School to explore the potential of offering other programs designed to celebrate the various cultures around the Greater Toronto area.

"For The Royal Conservatory, this partnership is very exciting," says Green. "Everyone involved in this relationship is learning a lot. It's been a wonderful experience working with The Koffler Centre of Music."

Hollywood discovers a new talent at Lipa Green Building

When the recent film, Max, was in production, Hollywood needed a talented Jewish singing voice to be used in place of an actor portraying a cantor.

Producers of the controversial John Cusack movie about Hitler's life as a frustrated artist in Munich, didn't have to look very far for their voice sensation. In fact, they found him in the Lipa Green Building on Bathurst Street through an agent who had submitted tapes to the producer.

Joshua Daniels, a building security professional has undertaken quite an interesting journey from his native Bombay to a Hollywood soundtrack.

"They were looking for someone who could sing, so they could dub it in over the actor," says Daniels, "I didn't even see much of the script, just what I had to sing."

Daniels' late father, Samuel, was a talented and well-respected cantor in Bombay and Israel, all the while maintaining his full-time career as deputy spinning master in the textile mills.

Often heard serenading visitors to the Lipa Green Building, Joshua possesses the rare talent of serving as a cantor in Ashkenazi, Indian, and Sephardic styles. He can also read the Torah – another passion of his – in the same three different melodies. Daniels is the only Indian-born cantor to have mastered all three.

"I really had no choice, I definitely knew that I would follow in my father's footsteps," says Daniels. "At the age of 11, I was already singing in a Bombay Synagogue where my father was the cantor. I love to sing for people, especially religiously. It is a gift I am very grateful for."

Now 50, Daniels and his family - father, Samuel; mother, Hannah, and three brothers; Japheth, Jeremiah, and Jonathan - made aliyah from Bombay in 1968. Following the sojourn to their new home, Samuel Daniels became cantor in a Kiryat Yam synagogue, on the outskirts of Haifa, which the family called home.

After his father passed away in 1973, Joshua, who served with the Israeli Defence Forces in the Yom Kippur and Lebanon wars, became the congregation's assistant chazan until – in 1980 – he was appointed fulltime cantor, fulfilling his childhood dream. In 1985, at the age of 33, Joshua appeared on an Israeli television show to display his talents.

Joshua Daniels

When not keeping things secure at the Lipa Green Building, Daniels continues to showcase his talents in both Canada and the United States. He is also proud of his bar/bat mitzvah tutoring program.

As far as his future in motion pictures is concerned, Joshua is taking a wait and see attitude. "Right now, I'm very happy singing for people here and abroad," he says. "In fact, I recently sang with my daughter which makes me so proud and happy."

And undoubtedly, if you ask Joshua Daniels, he'd agree that that's a better story than any Hollywood movie script could ever produce.

Harry Rosen speaks off the cuff

UJA Federation's Jewish Chamber of Commerce (JCOC) recently held an event at The Sheraton Centre in Toronto featuring Harry Rosen, Executive Chairman of Harry Rosen Inc. (L-R) Michael Winton, Board Member of JCOC; Harry Rosen; Richard Wajs, Chair of JCOC; and Robert Levy, Board Member of JCOC.

Mr. Rosen, a past chair of UJA Federation's Fashion Division, was perfectly suited for the event as he shared tales of his business accomplishments with the audience of close to 200. The JCOC provides Toronto's Jewish community with the chance to build and develop a network of outstanding business contacts.

"We've received outstanding feedback about Mr. Rosen's presentation, and about the entire evening in general," says Wajs. "It was another wonderful opportunity for Toronto's Jewish business community to be exposed to an icon, and an incredibly successful entrepreneur who has made his mark on the Canadian retail landscape."

The next JCOC event takes place on April 30th with keynote speaker Jim Balsillie - CEO of RIM (Research in Motion).

For additional information regarding the JCOC, please contact Elana Carr at 416-631-5736 or e-mail ecarr @ujafed.org

Latest Israeli mission a flurry of activity

For participants on the recent UJA Federation Mizrachi Solidarity Mission to Israel, chaired by Sam Moskowitz, getting homesick for Toronto was virtually impossible. In fact, for the first two days of the trip in Jerusalem, they could be forgiven for thinking they were still in the midst of Toronto's unrelenting winter.

About 30 centimetres of snow settled in Jerusalem coinciding with the arrival of the Torontonians.

"All of that snow was fun," says mission participant Steve Jacobs, who was with his 12-year-old son, Chaim Akiva. "It was rather interesting to see Jerusalem's only snowplow – a tractor, actually – battle the conditions. Actually, the blizzard made us all get together for one particularly memorable unscheduled event; in the middle of all that snow, we walked right from our hotel to the kotel. What a great experience that was."

Jacobs, a father of four, has visited Israel several times, but never before as part of a mission. "Basically, what I try to do is take each of my children during their bar or bat mitzvah year, on an organized trip to Israel," he says. "I feel that during a mission such as this, you have the best chance to enjoy the educational component more than if you went on your own. Through the mission we were able to hear fascinating speakers, and visit interesting places, which, otherwise, we would not likely be able to."

When asked about the highlight of the UJA Federation Mizrachi mission, Jacobs was adamant. "Every day was a highlight, really," he says. "Even though we were in a blizzard for the first two days, the mission organizers made sure that we had a full and interesting schedule."

Jacobs – and his son in particular – were impressed with an unscheduled visit to hear Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon address the Jewish Agency Board of Governors, as well as visits to Shaarei Tzedek Hospital, a bus ride from Jerusalem to Eilat where they visited various Partnership 2000 initiatives, and a dinner the Jacobs will never forget.

"I don't know how they did it, but one minute we were in a raging blizzard in Israel, then, almost suddenly, we were under the stars in Timna Park where we were all treated to a magnificent dinner in what felt like a natural terrace, surrounded by beautiful mountains," says Jacobs.

Jack Kahn, President, Mizrachi Organization of Canada, felt that the snow was anything but a downer for the participants.

"It was great fun," says Kahn. "The mood among the participants was fabulous, and although the snow made us lose some scheduled speakers, we ended up getting other tremendous speakers and programs such as a visit with the prime minister. I felt that the visit to Eilat was particularly impressive."

legacy of life

Louis Bregman 1926 – 2001

If it's Sunday morning, this must be The Bagel King.

For a generation of hungry Torontonians growing up in the 1950s, The Bagel King on Eglinton Avenue West was the place to be. Sure, the lineups were usually long and the place was noisy. But who cared when there was good food, interesting conversation, familiar faces, and a man with a twinkle in his eye waiting inside?

Louis "Bagels" Bregman – the fun-loving man who rolled bagels in the window of the cozy restaurant – was known as much for his incredible spirit as he was for his baking abilities. He loved his family dearly, he made friends easily, and he always welcomed his customers with open arms.

"Lou's philanthropy started back in The Bagel King days," says his wife Yetta, who worked alongside her husband at the popular eatery. "He loved people, especially the Jewish community, and he never turned anyone away. He was a kind and generous man who managed to touch everybody's heart."

Louis was born in 1926 in Toronto to Eastern European parents, the only boy among four sisters. As a child he worked alongside his father baking bagels at a downtown bakery. Although he left school at 15 to help his family, his love of learning never diminished. He loved to travel and had a wonderful sense of adventure. He lived in Florida and California as a young man, where he observed the newest trends in the food industry and was the first to introduce the bakery-café concept to Toronto. Over the years, many popular bakeries and restaurants carried the Bregman touch including The Bagel King, Cake Galleries, Hunt's and Woman's Bakery, Levy's Bread, Michel's Baguette, mmmarvelous mmmuffins, Bregman's The Bakery Restaurant, and Second Cup.

Louis Bregman at his Bar Mitzvah

"Louis was the finest human being one could ever imagine, and he had a heart that was bigger than he was," says friend Joey Tanenbaum. "He was dedicated to the Jewish community and to his family, and he never forgot from whence he came."

The more successful Louis became, the more motivated he was to give back to people who needed it more.

"My dad started out with nothing, but still made sure to donate as much as he could," says eldest son Michael. "He always said, 'I hope next time I can give more.' Fortunately things went well for him financially and he was able to give more each time."

Louis gave generously, especially to Israeli charities, to UJA Federation, to Mount Sinai Hospital, and to the University of Toronto. He was particularly proud of the community's support in helping to fund the Louis and Yetta Bregman Neonatal Operating Theatre at Shaarei Tzedek Hospital in Jerusalem.

"Dad felt good that he was able to give," says Michael, who chaired UJA Federation Campaign 2002 with David Koschitzky and now serves as chair of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation. "He used to say, 'You define success by how much you give, not by how much you make.' That had a great influence on me."

Those words have also made their way through the generations. Years ago Michael asked his Bar Mitzvah guests to donate to Jerusalem's Jewish Institute for the Blind in lieu of gifts. Louis and Yetta's grandchildren have done the same. Most recently, granddaughter Carrie Bregman asked guests to donate to a special fund through UJA Federation to help purchase an armoured bus for Israeli schoolchildren. In addition, the family has endowed the Louis Bregman Cardiac Critical Care Unit at Mount Sinai Hospital.

"Lou's sense of honour and dignity shines through in our children Michael and Barbara, Caurie and Lenny, Jodi, and Howard, and in our seven grandchildren," says Yetta. "He was very proud of all of them."

Legacy of Life is a presentation of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto to honour the memory of those who have made an exceptional contribution to our community.

Original Mt. Sinai site slated for redevelopment

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A little over 81 years ago, a small group of women embarked on a project that would change the way Jewish doctors practised medicine in Canada.

The women, organized into a group called the Ezras Noshem Society (translated loosely as the Help of Women Society), acquired a house at 100 Yorkville Ave. in central Toronto. They hoped to turn it into a hospital for the growing Jewish community and the expanding roster of Jewish doctors.

In 1922, the Mt. Sinai Hospital was born, first as a maternity hospital and a few years later, as a surgical facility. It was the first Jewish hospital in Canada. Jewish doctors, who did not enjoy admission privileges in any of the other hospitals in Toronto, now had a place to refer their patients. And Jewish patients had access to kosher food and other amenities that made them feel more comfortable.

The hospital, which started with only 20 beds, continued to operate on the site until 1953, when a more spacious facility was constructed on University Avenue.

Ten years ago, the old building on Yorkville was demolished, leaving only the facade. Last week, Toronto City Council approved a mixed use redevelopment plan that would see the construction of an eight-storey retail and office building facing Yorkville Avenue, as well as an 18-storey residential tower at the eastern end of the property.

The proposed development plan has some residents up in arms over issues of increased density, traffic congestion and the impact a major redevelopment will have on the neighbourhood's charm and character.

The Ontario Municipal Board (OMB) will hear an appeal of the plan, but should it proceed, it will see the 90-foot wide, two-storey facade incorporated into the eight-storey building.

The facade has been declared a heritage site under the Ontario Heritage Act and will be lifted and moved either to the sidewalk or the street to allow excavation and construction at its current location, said Michael McClellan, one of the team of heritage architects working on the project. When the work is done, the facade will become part of the new building.

Another small piece of historic memorabilia, a dedication plaque that was found about a year ago still attached to the building, will be removed and turned over to the Mt. Sinai Auxiliary, the successor group to the Ezras Noshem. The 12-by-8-inch stone plaque states simply, in Hebrew and English, that the Mt. Sinai Hospital was founded by the Ezras Noshem Society.

Marlene Borins, president of the Mt. Sinai Auxiliary, said the plaque will be given prominent display at the hospital. It would, she said, become "a museum piece for the hospital."

Lawyer Sheldon Godfrey, who is chair of the Heritage Canada Foundation and who has taken an interest in the project, said the plaque "links the old Mt. Sinai with the new Mt. Sinai."

Councillor Kyle Rae, who has been shepherding the development project through the approval process, said the land where the hospital once stood has been the subject of various development proposals.

In approving the project, city council required that the old facade be incorporated into the new structure, Rae said, adding that council is also lobbying to have the facade declared a national heritage site, as the first Jewish hospital in Canada.

Rae said he expected construction would begin in the fall and be completed in about 18 months.

One prominent Yorkville citizen who is not happy with the current plan is Budd Sugarman, an interior designer who co-founded the now disbanded Village of Yorkville Association and who was a longtime member of local Business Improvement Area.

The original Mt. Sinai Hospital

Known as the unofficial "mayor of Yorkville," Sugarman believes the facade should remain where it is and any development should proceed around it. "It's a heritage site right where it is. If you start fooling around with it, the heritage quality of it, in my humble opinion, changes."

McClelland, who found the plaque while examining the site, said that when the project is completed, the facade will adorn the front of the proposed retail space, behind a landscaped area.

McClelland said the facade "was a very typical, very appropriate architecture for the period."

Designed by the firm of Kaminker and Richmond, the facade incorporates two stars of David, he said.

Historian Stephen Speisman, the founder and former director of the Ontario Jewish Archives, said the creation of the Mt. Sinai hospital was a tremendous achievement in its day. Ezras Noshem not only created the hospital, but prior to that, the volunteer group had established a Jewish home for the aged.

They raised the funds for their charitable enterprises the hard way, through bazaars and door-to-door solicitations. "This was nickels and dimes. It was not a wealthy community," Speisman said.

Unfortunately, he said, the current hospital does not seem to give the early pioneers recognition commensurate with their contribution. "One thing that always bothered me about Mt. Sinai. If you go into the lobby of the new hospital, you'll not see a picture of the Ezras Noshem Society."

Jewish war collaborators now viewed in new light

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In the period immediately after the Holocaust, Jews who had collaborated with the Nazis were universally regarded as criminals.

But in recent years, scholars of the Holocaust have adopted a more nuanaced, even "indulgent," view of collaborators, claims British historian Bernard Wasserstein.

In a speech recently at the University of Toronto, Wasserstein said that attitudes toward Jewish collaborators have shifted, swinging from condemnation to understanding.

When Adolf Eichmann was tried as a war criminal in Jerusalem, Hannah Arendt wrote a blistering book in which she portrayed members of Nazi-appointed Jewish Councils (Judenrat) as outright collaborators.

But since then, historians such as Isaiah Trunk and Yehuda Bauer have written books empathizing with the morally agonizing choices forced upon Jewish Council chairmen and pointing out that some covertly helped Jewish resistance movements. Wasserstein, who delivered his remarks at the Munk Centre of International Studies, drew distinctions between what he described as voluntary and involuntary collaboration and informed and uninformed collaboration.

Often, he observed, collaborators and resisters fed off each other in a symbiotic relationship.

Collaboration, in a few cases, constituted a form of resistance, said Wasserstein, a University of Glasgow historian.

Wasserstein, past president of the Oxford Centre for Hebrew and Jewish Studies, said that scholars actually know very little about the Jewish Councils despite copious research. He conceded that they did not address the topic seriously until the 1960s.

Heads of Jewish Councils usually were not social outcasts and criminals but rather respected members of the pre-war Jewish leadership.

Wasserstein cited the cases of a number of Jewish collaborators, among them being: Abraham Ascher, a Dutch Jew who co-chaired the Jewish Council in Amsterdam; Rudolf Kastner, the Hungarian Jew who was involved in the failed 1944 blood-for-trucks negotiations, and Michael Weichert, a Polish Jew who worked for the Nazi-sanctioned Jewish Self-Help organization.

Although people like them tried to ameliorate the plight of Jews, they were soon regarded as "cogs in the machinery of death."

In the wake of World War II, about 150 Jewish collaborators were tried in Poland. But the majority were acquitted, he disclosed.

Several collaborators, such as Yacov Genz of Vilna and Chaim Rumkowski of Lodz, internalized the fascist values of their Nazi masters.

Yet they believed they were helping their fellow Jews, said Wasserstein.

Some Jewish leaders, such as an Orthodox rabbi whose name he declined to divulge, falsely reassured their flock that no harm would come to Jews. The rabbi's followers were murdered, and he fled to the safety of Palestine.

Wasserstein used Oskar Schindler, the famous German industrialist who rescued almost 2,000 Jews from certain death, as an example of the complex situation collaborators confronted in the face of German demands.

Schindler aided Germany's war effort by manufacturing weapons for the Wehrmacht. But at the same time, he protected his Jewish workers from deportations.

In general, he said, Jews were surprised by the wholesale massacres that came on the heels of Germany's occupation of countries such as Poland and the Soviet Union.

Evangelical Christian leaders head to Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Twenty leading evangelical Christian clergymen, authors, television personalities and educators departed last week for a one-week solidarity mission to Israel.

Their visit comes only a few months after Israeli Chief Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau extended an invitation to Christian leaders during a November visit to Toronto.

Mission participants are scheduled to meet Rabbi Lau as well as senior political and media figures in Israel.

Charles McVety, the head of the Canada Christian College, said the mission will "educate evangelicals why, according to scripture, they must support Israel."

Its long-term goal will be to rally support for Israel among the 2.5 million evangelical Christians living in Canada.

Grant Jeffrey, an author and publisher of more than 20 books on Bible prophecy, said mission participants "believe Israel needs to be supported as a vibrant democracy in a sea of dictatorships.

"We want to commit and say we stand with Israel shoulder to shoulder, and express our repentance as part of Christianity for the terrible sins that have been committed against the Jews," he said.

McVety, who represents the John Hagee Ministries in Canada, which has raised more than $4 million (US) to support aliyah, said members of the evangelical movement are strong backers of Israel. But "people feel isolated supporting Israel because our media is so hostile" to their evangelical beliefs, he said.

When they return, mission delegates are expected to take a leadership role encouraging grassroots evangelicals to more vocally "stand up and support Israel," McVety said.

Among the participants in the trip are television broadcaster David Mainse of Crossroads Christian Communications in Burlington, Ont., Willard Thiessen of Trinity TV in Winnipeg, as well as representatives of Now TV in Vancouver and the Miracle Channel in Lethbridge, Alta.

This mission is a joint venture involving three partners: McVety, the Israel Government Tourist Office and El Al Israel Airlines.

Getting ready to board a flight to Israel last week were evangelical leaders (from left) Willard Thiessen, David Mainse, Charles McVety and Grant Jeffrey.

TO MY DEAR LOVED ONES,

I wish to extend my deepest gratitude to all those who supported me through my recent illness. Your emotional support and good wishes lifted my spirits during my lengthy stay in the hospital.

Having my children Morris & Shelley Manna and Howard & Toby Sniderman by my side everyday kept me strong and gave me the encouragement to persevere.

My grandchildren Rachel, Adam, Jason & Justin were an ongoing source of joy and laughter.

I also wish to thank my dear sisters and brothers-in-law Mary & David Dale, Roslyn & Fred Shapero and Mamie Silverman.

A special thank you goes out to my nieces Betsy Fruitman and Lynda Wine for their constant love and devotion.

I extend my love to the Geist, Shapero, Fruitman, Wine, Citron, Manna & Leuchter families for their thoughts and prayers.

To my dear friend Sol Cohn and his family, I thank them for keeping me in their hearts.

To Dr. Robert Nam, his assistant Jen and the extraordinary nursing staff at Sunnybrook Hospital, your care and attention is second to none.

I am forever grateful,

HELEN SNIDERMAN

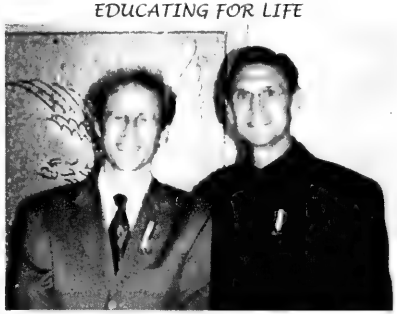
ORT TORONTO
EDUCATING FOR LIFE



ORT Toronto proudly congratulates Board Member Ian Leventhal and Executive Director Joel Shapiro on being awarded the Queen Elizabeth Golden Jubilee Medal in recognition of outstanding service to their community. Ian has been a strong supporter of Jewish organizations for many years and most recently was the co-chair of ORT Toronto's highly successful Gift of Friendship Art Exhibit. Joel has over thirty-five years of public service and most recently was instrumental in the development of ORT Toronto's highly acclaimed Youth Technology and Mentor Program.

The medal, awarded to select Canadians who have made significant contributions to their fellow citizens, their community or Canada, marks the accession of Her Majesty to the throne in February 1952.

On Campus

Convert passivity to pride, professor recommends

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

This is probably the best time in Canadian history to be a Jew on campus – unless you want to behave like a Jew by becoming involved with pro-Israel activities, said Irving Abella recently to a group of parents of double cohort students applying to university this year.

Joining the historian and York University professor were CJN reporter Anna Morgan; Zac Kaye, executive director, Hillel of Greater Toronto; and University of Toronto student Denes Rothschild.

The event, titled Being Jewish on Campus Today: An Evening to Prepare our Parents, took place at Holy Blossom Temple under the aegis of the congregation's Gerald Schwartz/Heather Reisman Centre for Jewish Learning. Rabbi Jason Rosenberg moderated the panel discussion.

Historically, Canadian universities have "not been so friendly to Jews," said Abella, recalling quotas on Jewish students and restrictions on hiring Jewish faculty in the first part of the 20th century.

Current Anti-Semitic attacks are "more subtle but no less pernicious, trying to prove that Judaism is itself racist."

What is new, Abella added, is a growing acceptability of anti-Jewishness by academics, media and politicians. The new anti-Semitism attempts to delegitimize Israel and its supporters, he said.

Abella said that many Jewish students, living away from home for the first time, "opt out" of the Jewish community, especially if there is no strong Jewish student organization or local Jewish community.

"We must try to build a Jewish community that is creative and attractive to our children, with substance and content. We'll have to try to convert passivity to pride, the pride of being possessors of a great legacy. Too many young people see Judaism as providing obligation, not reward.

"Before you send your children to university," Abella warned, "be aware that they will be spending a better part of their four years alongside non-Jews, and alongside Muslims whose hostile attitudes will have some impact."

He advised parents to tell their children that conflict, debates and arguments are routine at university. The major problem, he said, is that many Jewish students are not as well prepared for it nor as passionate as their Arab counterparts.

Because of their discomfort, some students avoid rallies and separate themselves from Jewish activities, Abella said.

"It's hard to blame them. They feel unprepared and inadequate. They feel they don't know as much and perhaps don't care as much – and if they don't, perhaps that's because we've failed...Perhaps they don't have the same primordial attachment to Israel that we do."

Abella said Jewish parents should remind their children that university life will be a great time for them, despite the problems. "University has never been hassle-free."

Part of Hillel's role, said Kaye, is to provide a Jewish voice on campus and to "maximize the number of Jews doing Jewish with other Jews." The organization supports activist students and reaches out to less involved students, he said

Because of the increase in anti-Israel sentiment on campus, Hillel has had to start educating Jewish students about the history of Israel and Zionism, said Kaye.

"We as a community, in our Jewish day schools, camps and synagogues, have to create opportunities for young people to learn about Israel and experience Israel."

On campus, he added, the hope is that programs like a revitalized Israel Week and Hillel's annual arts festival will kindle a sense of pride and communal spirit.

"It's not just about Israel or fighting the left wing," he said. "We have to find ways for students to do Jewish."

Rothschild, Hillel's Israel advocacy chair at the University of Toronto, said his group, which meets weekly, is concerned about reaching students who are uninformed about the Israeli-Palestinian conflict "before the other side gets to them with misinformation."

Among his group's activities is attendance at anti-Israel lectures, where, Rothschild said, "the most important thing is, you have to keep asking questions, when they take questions at the end. There's no substitute for getting your voice heard...It's so important that our side be represented. We let the non-committed people know that what they're getting is not a balanced viewpoint."

Students' experiences will vary according to where they attend school, what they study and which teachers they have, said Morgan. "Political science majors and sociology students are much more likely to be drawn into that debate."

But even students who stay away from certain faculties and professors may find themselves confronted by posters, graffiti, and discussion groups in central areas, she said.

Some students have told Morgan they don't want to talk about Zionism and have decided to focus on other aspects of their Jewishness. "I found that somewhat disturbing. It meant they're letting others dictate who they are."

At the University of Ottawa, where there are rules to limit offensive material on walls and in the form of public speech in central areas, students told Morgan they feel comfortable. "These issues are not insurmountable," she said. "They can be resolved."

Canadian Jews targeted for political 'engagement'

By DAVID LAZARUS

Canadian Jewish Congress is launching a national effort to get the Jewish community more involved in the Canadian political process.

The outreach program, called Civic Engagement and the Jewish Community, is intended to encourage Canadian Jews to become more involved in politics by working behind the scenes in party caucuses and backrooms, joining federal political parties and riding associations, volunteering in campaigns and getting to know their members of Parliament.

Brandi Epstein, CJC's director of public affairs in Ottawa, said she hopes to identify all Canadian Jews who belong to the 301 federal riding associations before the program's planned official launch in June.

That task has proved a bit easier in Quebec, she said, because politics is already very much "a part of [the Jewish population's] psyche compared to other areas [of the country]."

She said she would like to hear from Jews across the country who are members of local riding associations.

Once a minimum of 50 riding associations with Jewish members have been identified, CJC will launch a Civic Engagement Network that, CJC says, will "act as a grassroots vehicle [to] educat[e] members of Parliament on issues of concern to the Jewish community."

The question of just what constitutes a "Jewish issue," Epstein said, remains a matter of interpretation. Some, such as Israel or anti-Semitism, are obvious. But others, such as immigration or health care, can also affect the Jewish community.

Whatever the case, the network's focus will be "issues on the ground," she said.

Epstein said the initiative came about "partly because we, as a Jewish community, tend to be very reactive, instead of anticipatory.

"This will help us be better prepared. If we have an ongoing relationship with our politicians, we can influence change. It's better to have the relationship there, instead of reacting only in times of crisis."

The Sept. 11 attacks and the continued terrorism against Israel "prompted people to rethink about how they can keep their country safe. People began to think about issues like, 'What can I do, how can I get involved?' "

The CJC says continued terrorism has made it "increasingly important for all Canadians, and the Jewish community in particular, to adopt a more activist approach to public policy."

The CJC also says that often a lot more can be accomplished through "a few letters or phone calls received from voters in an MP's riding... than hundreds of letters sent to the prime minister from across the country.

"If an MP thinks his or her credibility is in jeopardy on an issue, it is certain that concern is expressed to cabinet or, in the case of an opposition party, to the leadership."

Epstein said CJC hopes its initiative will result in Jewish representation "in each and every riding" and "a national network with regional activists."

Although CJC is concentrating on federal ridings, she said the organization also hopes to identify Jews who are members of provincial riding associations.

Jewish community members across Canada who are members of federal political parties and riding associations can reach Epstein by phone at 613-233-8703, ext. 228, or by e-mail at <brandie@cjc.ca>.

In the article "Masorti suffers lack of 'brand recognition'" (CJN, Feb. 27), it was incorrectly stated that Schechter Institute rabbinical student Avinoam Sharon has served as High Holy Day cantor in Edmonton for 27 years. In fact, he has served as a chazzan for the High Holy Days in congregations in Israel and North America for 27 years, of which seven have been in Edmonton. The CJN regrets the error.
